

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2011 with funding from Universidad Francisco Marroquín

HISTORY

OF

AMERICA.

By WILLIAM ROBERTSON, D.D.

PRINCIPAL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH, HISTORIOGRAPHER TO HIS MAJESTY
FOR SCOTLAND,

AND MEMBER OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF HISTORY AT MADRID.

THE EIGHTH EDITION,

In which is included the Posthumous Volume,

CONTAINING

THE HISTORY OF VIRGINIA, TO THE YEAR 1688; AND OF NEW ENGLAND, TO THE YEAR 1652.

RANCISCO

BIBMOTEPA GE

IN THREE VOLUME

VOL. II.

LONDON:

Printed by A. Strahan, Printers-Street FOR T. CADELL JUN. AND W. DAVIES, STRAND,

AND E. BALFOUR, EDINBURGH.

1800.

10 - -

4 3 7 JL JI JE A

A THE RECORD STREET OF THE PARTY OF

and the first of the state of

The second of the second of the second

ACCESSION OF THE ACCA.

HISTORY OF AMERICA.

BOOK IV. Continued.

IV. Rom the domestic state of the Americans, the transition to the consideration of their civil government and political institutions is natural. In every inquiry concerning the operations of men when united together in society, the first object of attention should be their mode of subsistence. Accordingly as that varies, their laws and policy must be different. The institution suited to the ideas and exigencies of tribes, which subsistences of tribes, which subsistences of tribes, which subsistences of tribes, which subsistences of property, will be much more simple than those which must take place when the earth is cultivated with regular industry, and a right of property not only in its productions, but in the soil itself, is completely ascertained.

All the people of America, now under review, belong to the former class. But though they may all be comprehended under the general denomination of favage, the advances which they had made in the art of procuring to themselves a certain and plentiful subsistence, were very unevol. 11.

equal. On the extensive plains of South America, man appears in one of the rudest states in which he has been ever observed, or, perhaps, can exist. Several tribes depend entirely upon the bounty of Nature for subsistence. They discover no solicitude, they employ little foresight, they scarcely exert any industry, to secure what is necessary for their support. The Topayers of Brasil, the Guaxeros of Tierra Firme, the Caiguas, the Moxos, and several other people of Paraguay, are unacquainted with every species of cultivation. They neither sow nor plant. Even the culture of the manioc, of which cassada bread is made, is an art too intricate for their ingenuity, or too fatiguing to their indolence. The roots which the earth produces fpontaneously, the fruits, the berries, and the feeds, which they gather in the woods, together with lizards and other reptiles, which multiply with lizards and other reptiles, which multiply amazingly with the heat of the climate in a fat foil moistened by frequent rains, supply them with food during some part of the year. At other times they subsist by fishing; and Nature seems to have indulged the laziness of the South American tribes by the liberality with which she ministers, in this way, to their wants. The vast rivers of that region in America abound with an infinite variety of the most delicate sish. The lakes and marshes formed by the annual The lakes and marshes formed by the annual overflowing of the waters, are filled with all the different species, where they remain shut up, as in natural reservoirs, for the use of the inhabitants. They swarm in such shoals, that in some places they are catched without art or industry. In others, the natives have discovered a method of infecting the water with the juice of certain plants, by which the fish are so intoxicated, that they float on the surface, and are taken with the hand. Some tribes have ingenuity enough to preserve them without salt, by drying or smoking them upon hurdles over a flow fire. The prolific quality of the rivers in South America induces many of the natives to refort to their banks, and to depend almost entirely for nourishment on what their waters supply with such profusion. In this part of the globe, hunting feems not to have been the first employment of men, or the first effort of their invention and labour to obtain food. They were fishers before they became hunters; and as the occupations of the former do not call for equal exertions of activity, or talents, with those of the latter, people in that flate appear to possess neither the same degree of enterprise nor of ingenuity. The petty nations, adjacent to the Maragnon and Orinoco, are manifestly the most inactive and least intelligent of all the Americans.

² Nieuhoff. Hist. of Brasil. Church. Coll. ii. 134. Simon, Conquista de Tierra Firmè, p. 166. Techo, Account of Paraguay, &c. Church. vi. 78. Lettr. Edif. 23. 384. 10. 190. Lozano, Descrip. del Gran Chaco, p. 81. Ribas, Histor. de los Triumsos, &c. p. 7. different

None but tribes contiguous to great rivers can fustain themselves in this manner. The greater part of the American nations, dispersed

b See Note LIV. c See Note LV.

d Condam. 159. Gumilla, ii. 37. Lettr. Edif. 14. 199. 23. 328. Acugna, Relat. de la Riv. des Amaz. 138.

Barrere, Relat. de Fr. Equin. p. 155.

over the forests with which their country is over the forests with which their country is covered, do not procure subsistence with the same facility. For although these forests, especially in the southern continent of America, are stored plentifully with game, considerable efforts of activity and ingenuity are requisite in pursuit of it. Necessity incited the natives to the one, and taught them the other. Hunting became their principal occupation; and as it called forth strenuous exertions of courage, of force, and of invention, it was deemed no less honourable than necessary. This deemed no less honourable than necessary. This occupation was peculiar to the men. They were trained to it from their earliest youth. A bold and dexterous hunter ranked next in fame to the distinguished warrior, and an alliance with the former is often courted in preference to one with the latter g. Hardly any device, which the inthe latter s. Hardly any device, which the ingenuity of man has discovered for ensnaring or destroying wild animals, was unknown to the Americans. While engaged in this favourite exercise, they shake off the indolence peculiar to their nature, the latent powers and vigour of their minds are roused, and they become active, persevering, and indefatigable. Their sagacity in finding their prey, and their address in killing it, are equal. Their reason and their senses being constantly directed towards this one object, the former displays such fertility of invention, and the latter acquire such a degree of acuteness, as appear almost incredible. They discern the footsteps of a wild beast, which escape every other eye, and can follow them with certainty

f P. Martyr, Decad. p. 324. Gumilla, ii. 4, &c. Acugna, i. 156. E Charlev. Histoire de la N. France, iii. 115. through through the pathless forest. If they attack their game openly, their arrow feldom errs from the mark h; if they endeavour to circumvent it by art, it is almost impossible to avoid their toils. Among feveral tribes, their young men were not permitted to marry, until they had given such proofs of their skill in hunting as put it beyond doubt that they were capable of providing for a family. Their ingenuity, always on the stretch and sharpened by emulation, as well as necessity; has struck out many inventions, which greatly facilitate success in the chase. The most singular of these is the discovery of a poison in which they dip the arrows employed in hunting. The slightest wound with those envenomed shafts is mortal. If they only pierce the skin, the blood fixes and congeals in a moment, and the strongest animal falls motionless to the ground. Nor does this poison, notwithstanding its violence and fubtlety, infect the flesh of the animal which it kills. That may be eaten with perfect fafety, and retains its native relish and qualities. All the nations fituated upon the banks of the Maragnon and Orinoco are acquainted with this composition, the chief ingredient in which is the juice extracted from the root of the curare, a species of withe i. In other parts of America, they employ the juice of the manchenille for the same purpose, and it operates with no less fatal activity. To people possessed of those secrets, the bow is a more destructive weapon than the musket.

ii. 239. Bancroft's Nat. Hist. of Guiana, 281, &c.

h Biet. Voy. de France Equin. 357. Davies' Discov. of the River of Amaz. Purchas, iv. p. 1287.

Gumilla, ii. 1. &c. Condam. 208. Recherch. Philos.

musket, and, in their skilful hands, does great execution among the birds and beasts which abound in the forests of America.

But the life of a hunter gradually leads man to a state more advanced. The chase, even where prey is abundant, and the dexterity of the hunter much improved, affords but an uncertain maintenance, and at some seasons it must be suspended altogether. If a favage trusts to his bow alone for food, he and his family will be often reduced to extreme diffress k. Hardly any region of the earth furnishes man spontaneously with what his wants require. In the mildest climates, and most fertile soils, his own industry and foresight must be exerted in some degree, to secure a regular sup-ply of food. Their experience of this surmounts the abhorrence of labour natural to favage nations, and compels them to have recourse to culture, as subsidiary to hunting. In particular fituations, fome fmall tribes may subsist by fishing, independent of any production of the earth, raised by their own industry. But throughout all America, we scarcely meet with any nation of hunters, which does not practife some species of cultivation.

The agriculture of the Americans, however, is neither extensive nor laborious. As game and fish are their principal food, all they aim at by cultivation, is to supply any occasional defect of these. In the southern continent of America, the natives confined their industry to rearing a few plants, which, in a rich soil and warm climate, were easily trained to maturity. The chief of these is Maize, well known in Europe by the name of Turkey or Indian wheat, a grain extremely prolific, of simple culture, agreeable to the taste, and affording a strong hearty nourishment. The second is the Manioe, which grows to the fize of a large shrub, or small tree, and produces roots fomewhat refembling parfnips. After carefully squeezing out the juice, these roots are grated down to a fine powder, and formed into thin cakes, called Cassada bread, which, though insipid to the taste, proves no contemptible food. As the juice of the manioc is a deadly poison, some authors have celebrated the ingenuity of the Americans, in converting a noxious plant into wholesome nourishment. But it should rather be considered as one of the defperate expedients for procuring subfishence, to which necessity reduces rude nations; or, perhaps, men were led to the use of it by a progress, in which there is nothing marvellous. One fpecies of manioc is altogether free of any poi-fonous quality, and may be eaten without any preparation but that of roasting it in the embers. This, it is probable, was first used by the Americans as food; and necessity having gradually taught them the art of separating its pernicious juice from the other species, they have by experience found it to be more prolific as well as more nourishing. The third is the plantain, which though it is to the hind is the plantain, which, though it rifes to the height of a tree, is of fuch quick growth, that in less than a year it rewards the industry of the cultivator, with its fruit. This, when roasted, supplies the place of bread, and is both palatable and nourishing. The fourth is the potatoe, whose culture and qualities are too well known to need any description. The fifth is pimento, a small tree, yielding a strong aromatic spice. The Americans, who, like other inhabitants of warm climates, delight in whatever is hot and of poignant slavour, deem this seasoning a necessary of life, and mingle it copiously with every kind of food they take.

¹ Sloane Hist. of Jam. Introd. p. 18. Labat. i. 394. Acosta Hist. Ind. Occid. Natur. lib. iv. c. 17. Ulloa, i. 62. Aublet Mem. sur le Magnioc. Hist. des Plantes, tom. ii. p. 65, &c. m Martyr, Decad 3012 Labat. i. 411. Gumilla, iii. 192. Machucha Milic. Indiana, 164. See Note LVII.

Such are the various productions which were the chief object of culture among the hunting tribes on the continent of America, and with a moderate exertion of active and provident industry, these might have yielded a full supply to the wants of a numerous people. But men, accustomed to the free and vagrant life of hunters, are incapable of regular application to labour; and consider agriculture as a secondary and inferior occupation. Accordingly, the provision for subsistence, arising from cultivation, was so limited and scanty among the Americans, that, upon any accidental failure of their usual success in hunting, they were often reduced to extreme diffress.

In the islands, the mode of subsisting was considerably different. None of the large animals which abound on the continent were known there. Only four species of quadrupeds, besides a kind of small dumb dog, existed in the islands, n See Note LVIII.

⁹ Gumilla, iii. 171.

the biggest of which did not exceed the size of a rabbit?. To hunt fuch diminutive prey, was an occupation which required no effort either of activity or courage. The chief employment of a hunter in the illes was to kill birds, which on the continent are deemed ignoble game, and left chiefly to the pursuit of boys q. This want of animals, as well as their peculiar situation, led the islanders to depend principally upon fishing for their subsistence. Their rivers, and the sea with which they are furrounded, supplied them with this species of food. At some particular feafons, turtle, crabs, and other shell-fish. abounded in fuch numbers, that the matives could support themselves with a facility in which their indolence delighted's. At other times, they ate lizards, and various reptiles of odious forms. To fishing, the inhabitants of the islands added some degree of agriculture. Maize u, manioc, and other plants, were cultivated in the fame manner as on the continent. But all the fruits of their industry, together with what their foil and climate produced spontaneously, afforded them but a scanty maintenance. Though their demands for food were very sparing, they hardly raised what was sufficient for their own consumption. If a few Spaniards settled in any district, such a small addition of supernumerary mouths soon exhausted their scanty stores, and brought on a famine.

YOL. II. C Two

P Oviedo, lib. xii. in proem. 9 Ribas Hist. de los Triumph. p. 13. De la Potherie, ii. 33. iii. 20.

F Oviedo, lib. xiii. c. 1. Gomara, Hist. Gener. c. 28. Gomara Hist. Gener. c. 9. Labat. ii. 221, &c.

Oviedo, lib. xiii. c- 3. u See Note Lik.

Two circumstances, common to all the savage nations of America, concurred with those which I have already mentioned, not only in rendering their agriculture imperfect, but in circumscribing their power in all their operations. They had no tame animals; and they were unacquainted with the useful metals.

In other parts of the globe, man, in his rudest flate, appears as lord of the creation, giving law to various tribes of animals, which he has tamed and reduced to subjection. The Tartar follows his prey on the horfe which he has reared; or tends his numerous herds, which furnish him both with food and clothing; the Arab has rendered the camel docile, and avails himself of its perfevering strength; the Laplander has formed the rein-deer to be subservient to his will; and even the people of Kamchatka have trained their dogs to labour. This command over the inferior creatures is one of the noblest prerogatives of man, and among the greatest efforts of his wisdom and power. Without this, his dominion is incomplete. He is a monarch, who has no subjects; a master, without servants, and must perform every operation by the strength of his own arm. Such was the condition of all the rude nations in America. Their reason was so little improved, or their union so incomplete, that they feem not to have been conscious of the superiority of their nature, and suffered all the animal creation to retain its liberty, without establishing their own authority over any one species. Most of the animals, indeed, which have been rendered domestic in our continent, do not exist in the New World; but those peculiar to it are neither so fierce, nor so formidable, as to have exempted them from fervitude. There are some animals of the same species in both continents. But the rein-deer, which has been tamed and broken to the yoke in the one hemisphere, runs wild in the other. The bison of America is manifestly of the same species with the horned cattle of the other hemisphere x. The latter, even among the rudest nations in our continent, have been rendered domestic; and, in consequence of his dominion over them, man can accomplish works of labour with greater facility, and has made a great addition to his means of subsistence. The inhabitants of many regions of the New World, where the bison abounds, might have derived the same advantages from it. It is not of a nature so indocile, but that it might have been trained to be as subservient to man as our cattle. But a savage, in that uncultivated state wherein the Americans were discovered, is the enemy of the other animals, not their superior. He wastes and destroys, but knows not how to multiply or to govern them 2.

culiar

This, perhaps, is the most notable distinction between the inhabitants of the Ancient and New Worlds, and a high pre-eminence of civilized men above such as continue rude. The greatest operations of man in changing and improving the face of nature, as well as his most considerable efforts in cultivating the earth, are accomplished by means of the aid which he receives from the animals whom he has tamed and employs in labour. It is by their strength that he subdues the stubborn soil, and converts the defert or marsh into a fruitful field. But man, in his civilized state, is so accustomed to the service of the domestic animals, that he seldom resects upon the vast benefits which he derives from it. If we were to suppose him, even when most improved, to be deprived of their useful ministry, his empire over nature must in some measure cease, and he would remain a seeble animal, at a loss how to subsist, and incapable of attempting such arduous undertakings as their assistance enables him to excute with ease.

^{*} Buffon, Artic. Bison.

Nouv. Decouverte par Hennepin, p. 192. Kalm. i. 207.

Buffon Hilt. Nat. ix. 85. Hist. Philos. et Polit. des Etablissem. des Europ. dans les deux Indes, vi. 364.

It is a doubtful point, whether the dominion of man over the animal creation, or his acquiring the use of metals, has contributed most to extend his power. The æra of this important discovery is unknown, and in our hemisphere very remote. It is only by tradition, or by digging up fome rude inftruments of our forefathers, that we learn that mankind were originally unacquainted with the use of metals, and endeavoured to supply the want of them by employing slints, shells, bones, and other hard substances, for the same purposes which metals serve among polished nations. Nature completes the formation of some metals. Gold, silver, and copper are found in their perfect state in the clefts of rocks, in the fides of mountains, or the channels of rivers. These were accordingly the metals first known, and first applied to use. But iron, the most serviceable of all, and to which man is most indebted, is never discovered in its perfect form; its gross and stubborn ore must feel twice the force of fire, and go through two laborious processes, before it become fit for use. Man was long acquainted with the other metals, before he acquired the art of fabricating iron, or attained fuch ingenuity as to perfect an invention, to which he is indebted for those instruments wherewith he subdues the earth, and commands all its inhabitants. But in this, as well as in many other respects, the inferiority of the Americans was conspicuous. All the savage tribes, scattered over the continent and islands, were totally unacquainted with the metals which their foil produces in great abundance, if we except some trisling quantity of gold, which they picked up in the torrents that descended from their mountains, and formed into ornaments. Their devices to supply this want of the serviceable metals, were extremely rude and awkward. The most simple operation was to them an undertaking of immense difficulty and labour. To fell a tree with no other instruments than hatchets of stone, was employment for a month a. To form a canoe into shape, and to hollow it, confumed years; and it frequently began to rot before they were able to finish it. Their operations in agriculture were equally slow and defective. In a country covered with woods of the hardest timber, the clearing of a small field destined for culture required the united efforts of a tribe, and was a work of much time and great toil. This was the business of the men, and their indolence was fatisfied with performing it in a very flovenly manner. The labour of cultivation was left to the women, who, after digging, or rather flirring the field, with wooden mattocks, and stakes hardened in the fire, sowed or planted it; but they were more indebted for the increase to the fertility of the soil, than to their own rude industry.

² Gumilla, iii. 196. ^b Borde Relat. des Caraibes, p. 22.

Agriculture, even when the strength of man is seconded by that of the animals which he has subjected to the yoke, and his power augmented by the use of the various instruments with which the discovery of metals has surnished him, is still a work of great labour; and it is with the sweat of his brow that he renders the earth fertile. It is not wonderful, then, that people destitute of both these advantages should have made so little progress in cultivation, that they must be considered as depending for subsistence on sishing and hunting, rather than on the fruits of their own labour.

From this description of the mode of subsisting among the rude American tribes, the form and genius of their political infitutions may be deduced, and we are enabled to trace various circumstances of distinction between them and more civilized nations.

1. They were divided into fmall independent communities. While hunting is the chief fource of fubfishence, a vast extent of territory is requisite for supporting a small number of people. In proportion as men multiply and unite, the wild animals, on which they depend for food, diminish, or sly at a greater distance from the haunts of their enemy. The increase of a society in this

Gumilla, iii. 166, &c. Lettr. Edif. xii. 10.

ftate is limited by its own nature, and the members of it must either disperse, like the game which they pursue, or fall upon some better method of procuring food, than by hunting. Beasts of prey are by nature solitary and unsocial, they go not forth to the chase in herds, but delight in those recesses of the forest where they can roam and destroy undisturbed. A nation of hunters resembles them both in occupation and in genius. They cannot form into large communities, because it would be impossible to find subsistence; and they must drive to a distance every rival who may increach on those domains, which they consider as their own. This was the state of all the American tribes, the numbers in each were inconfiderable, though scattered over countries of great extent; they were far removed from one another, and engaged in perpetual hostilities or rivalship d. In America, the word nation is not of the same import as in other parts of the globe. It is applied to small societies, not exceeding, perhaps, two or three hundred persons, but occupying provinces greater than some kingdoms in Europe. The country of Guiana, though of larger extent than the kingdom of France, and divided among a greater number of nations, did not contain above twenty-five thousand inhabitants. In the provinces which border on the Orinoco, one may travel several hundred miles in different directions, without finding a fingle hut, or observing the footsteps of a human creature.

d Lozano, Descrip: del Gran Chaco, 59. 62. Fernandez, Relac. Hitt. de los Chiquit. 162. e Voyages de Marchais, iv. 353.

creature f. In North-America, where the climate is more rigorous, and the foil less fertile, the desolation is still greater. There, journeys of some hundred leagues have been made through uninhabited plains and forests. As long as hunting continues to be the chief employment of man to which he trusts for subsistence, he can hardly be said to have occupied the earth h.

2. Nations which depend upon hunting are, in a great measure, strangers to the idea of property. As the animals on which the hunter feeds are not bred under his inspection, nor nourished by his care, he can claim no right to them, while they run wild in the forest. Where game is so plentiful that it may be catched with little trouble, men never dream of appropriating what is of small value, or of easy acquisition. Where it is fo rare, that the labour or danger of the chase requires the united efforts of a tribe, or village, what is killed is a common flock, belonging equally to all, who, by their skill or their courage, have contributed to the success of the excursion. The forest, or hunting-grounds, are deemed the property of the tribe, from which it has a title to exclude every rival nation. But no individual arrogates a right to any district of these, in preference to his fellow-citizens. They belong alike to all; and thither, as to a general and undivided store, all repair in quest of sustenance. The same principles by which they regulate their chief occupation, extend to that which is subordinate. Even agriculture has not

f Gumilla, ii. 101. B. M. Fabry, quoted by Buffon, iii. 488. Lafitau, ii. 179. Boffu, Travels through Louifiana, i. 111. See NOTE LX.

h See NOTE LXI.
introduced

introduced among them a complete idea of property. As the men hunt, the women labour together, and after they have shared the toils of the seed-time, they enjoy the harvest in common so their cultivated lands is deposited in a public granary, and divided among them at stated times, according to their wants so Among others, though they lay up separate stores, they do not acquire such an exclusive right of property, that they can enjoy superfluity, while those around them suffer want so Thus the distinctions arising from the inequality of possessions are unknown. The terms rich or poor enter not into their language, and being strangers to property, they are unacquainted with what is the great object of laws and policy, as well as the chief motive which induced mankind to establish the various arrangements of regular government m.

3. People in this state retain a high sense of equality and independence. Wherever the idea of property is not established, there can be no distinction among men, but what arises from personal qualities. These can be conspicuous only on such occasions as call them forth into exertion. In times of danger, or in affairs of intricacy, the wisdom and experience of age are consulted, and prescribe the measures which ought to be pursued. When a tribe of savages

Derays, Hist. Natur. ii. 392, 393.

M. P. Martyr, Decad. p. 45. Veneg. Hist. of Californ. i. 66. Lery, Navig. in Brasil. c. 17.

takes the field against the enemies of their country, the warrior of most approved courage leads the youth to the combat . If they go forth in a body to the chase, the most expert and adventurous hunter is foremost, and directs their motions. But during feafons of tranquillity and inaction, when there is no occasion to display those talents, all pre-eminence ceases. Every circumstance indicates, that all the members of the community are on a level. They are clothed in the fame simple garb. They feed on the same plain fare. Their houses and surniture are exactly similar. No distinction can arise from the inequality of possessions. Whatever forms dependence on one part, or constitutes superi-ority on the other, is unknown. All are freemen, all feel themselves to be such, and affert with firmness the rights which belong to that condition . This sentiment of independence is imprinted fo deeply in their nature, that no change of condition can eradicate it, and bend their minds to fervitude. Accustomed to be absolute masters of their own conduct, they disdain to execute the orders of another; and having never known controul, they will not fubmit to correction P. Many of the Americans, when they found that they were treated as flaves by the Spaniards, died of grief; many destroyed themselves in despair q.

[&]quot;Acosta, Hist lib. vi. c. 19. Stadius, Hist. Brasil, lib. ii.
c. 13. De Bry, iii. p. 110. Biet. 361. Labat.
vi. 124. Brickell, Hist. of Carol. 310. See Note LXIII. Q Oviedo, lib. iii. c. 6. p. 97. Vega, Conquist. de la Florida, i. 30. ii. 416. Labat. ii. 138.
Benzo, Hist. Nov. Orb. lib. iv. c. 25.
4. Among

4. Among people in this state, government can assume little authority, and the sense of civil fubordination must remain very imperfect. While the idea of property is unknown, or incom-pletely conceived; while the fpontaneous productions of the earth, as well as the fruits of industry, are considered as belonging to the public stock, there can hardly be any fuch fubject of difference or discussion among the members of the fame community, as will require the hand of authority to interpole in order to adjust it. Where the right of separate and exclusive possession is not introduced, the great object of law and jurisdiction does not exist. When the members of a tribe are called into the field, either to invade the territories of their enemies, or to repel their attacks, when they are engaged together in the toil and dangers of the chase, they then perceive that they are part of a political body. They are conscious of their own connection with the companions in conjunction with whom they act; and they follow and reverence fuch as excel in conduct and valour. But, during the intervals between fuch common efforts, they feem fcarcely to feel the ties of political union r. No vifible form of government is established. The names of magistrate and fubject are not in use. Every one seems to enjoy his natural independence almost entire. If a scheme of public utility be proposed, the members of the community are left at liberty to choose whether they will or will not affift in carrying it into execution. No statute imposes

r Lozano, Descr. del Gran Chaco, 93. Melendez Teforos Verdaderos, ii. 23. . See Note LXIV.

any fervice as a duty, no compulsory laws oblige them to perform it. All their resolutions are voluntary, and flow from the impulse of their own minds s. The first step towards establishing a public jurisdiction has not been taken in those rude societies. The right, of revenge is lest in private hands t. If violence is committed, or blood is shed, the community does not assume the power either of inflicting or of moderating the punishment. It belongs to the family and friends of the person injured or slain to avenge the wrong, or to accept of the reparation offered by the aggressor. If the elders interpose, it is to advise, not to decide, and it is seldom their counfels are listened to; for as it is deemed pufillanimous to fuffer an offender to escape with impunity, refentment is implacable and everlafting ". The object of government among favages is rather foreign than domestic. They do not aim at maintaining interior order and police by public regulations, or the exertions of any permanent authority, but labour to preserve such union among the members of their tribe, that they may watch the motions of their enemies, and act against them with concert and vigour.

Such was the form of political order established among the greater part of the American nations. In this state were almost all the tribes spread over the provinces extending eastward of the Mississippi, from the mouth of the St. Laurence to the confines of Florida. In a therrera, dec. 8. lib. iv. c. 8.

Charlev. Hist. N. France, iii. 266. 268.

u Charlev. Hist. N. France, iii. 271, 272.

Lasit. i. 486. Cassani, Hist. de Nuevo Reyno de Granada, 226.

similar

fimilar condition were the people of Brafil, the inhabitants of Chili, several tribes in Paraguay and Guiana, and in the countries which ftretch from the mouth of the Orinoco to the peninfula of Yucatan. Among fuch an infinite number of petty affociations, there may be pe-culiarities which conflitute a distinction, and mark the various degrees of their civilization and improvement. But an attempt to trace and enumerate these would be vain, as they have not been observed by persons capable of discerning the minute and delicate circumstances, which serve to discriminate nations resembling one another in their general character and features. The description which I have given of the political inflitutions that took place among those rude tribes in America, concerning which we have received most complete information, will apply, with little variation, to every people, both in its northern and fouthern division, who have advanced no farther in civilization, than to addfome slender degree of agriculture to fishing and hunting.

Imperfect as those institutions may appear, several tribes were not so far advanced in their political progress. Among all those petty nations which trusted for subsistence entirely to sishing and hunting without any species of cultivation, the union was so incomplete, and their sense of mutual dependence so feeble, that hardly any appearance of government or order can be discerned in their proceedings. Their wants are few, their objects of pursuit simple, they form into separate tribes, and act together, from instinct, habit, or conveniency, rather than from any formal concert and affociation. To this class belong the Californians, several of the small nations in the extensive country of Paraguay, some of the people on the banks of the Orinoco, and on the river St. Magdalene, in the new kingdom of Granada x.

But though among these last-mentioned tribes there was hardly any shadow of regular govern-ment, and even among those which I first de-scribed, its authority is slender and confined within narrow bounds, there were, however, fome places in America where government was? carried far beyond the degree of perfection which feems natural to rude nations. In furveying the political operations of man, either in his favage or civilized flate, we discover fingular. and eccentric inftitutions, which flart as it were from their station, and fly off so wide, that we labour in vain to bring them within the general laws of any fystem, or to account for them by those principles which influence other communities in a fimilar fituation. Some instances of this occur among those people of America, whom I have included under the common denomination of favage. These are so curious and important that I shall describe them, and attempt to explain their origin.

In the New World, as well as in other parts of the globe, cold or temperate countries appear to be the favourite feat of freedom and independence. There the mind, like the body, is firm and vigorous. There men, conscious of their

^{*} Venegas, i. 68. Lettr. Edif. ii. 176. Techo Hist. of Parag. Churchill, vi: 78. Hist. Gen. des Voyages, xiv. 74.

their own dignity, and capable of the greatest efforts in afferting it, aspire to independence, and their stubborn spirits stoop with reluctance to the yoke of servitude. In warmer climates, by whose influence the whole frame is so much enervated, that prefent pleafure is the supreme felicity, and mere repose is enjoyment, men acquiesce, almost without a struggle, in the dominion of a fuperior. Accordingly, if we proceed from north to fouth along the continent of America, we shall find the power of those vested with authority gradually increasing, and the fpirit of the people becoming more tame and passive. In Florida, the authority of the sachems, caziques, or chiefs, was not only permanent, but hereditary. They were distinguished by peculiar ornaments, they enjoyed prerogatives of various kinds, and were treated by their subjects with that reverence, which people accustomed to subjection pay to a master y. Among the Natchez, a powerful tribe now extinct, formerly situated on the banks of the Mississippi, a difference of rank took place, with which the northern tribes were altogether unacquainted. Some families were reputed noble, and enjoyed hereditary dignity. The body of the people was considered as vile, and formed only for subjection. This distinction was marked by appellations which intimated the high elevation of the one state, and the ignominious depression of the other. The former were called Respectable; the latter,

y Cardenas y Cano Ensayo Chronol. à la Hist. de Florida, p. 46. Le Moyne de Morgues Icones Floridæ. Ap. de Bry, p. 1. 4, &c. Charlev. Hist. N. France, iii. 467, 468.

the Stinkards. The great chief, in whom the supreme authority was vested, is reputed to be a being of superior nature, the brother of the Sun, the sole object of their worship. They approach this great chief with religious veneration, and honour him as the representative of their deity. His will is a law, to which all fubmit with implicit obedience. The lives of his subjects are so absolutely at his disposal, that if any one has incurred his displeasure, the offender comes with profound humility and offers him his head. Nor does the dominion of the chiefs end with their lives; their principal officers, their favourite wives, together with many domestics of inferior rank, are facrificed at their tombs, that they may be attended in the next world by the fame persons who served them in this; and such is the reverence in which they are held, that those victims welcome death with exultation, deeming it a recompence of their fidelity, and a mark of distinction, to be selected to accompany their deceased master z. Thus a perfect despotism, with its full train of fuperstition, arrogance, and cruelty, is established among the Natchez, and by a fingular fatality, that people has tasted of the worst calamities incident to polished nations, though they themselves are not far advanced beyond the tribes around them in civility and improvement. In Hispaniola, Cuba, and the larger islands, their caziques or chiefs possessed extensive power. The dignity was transmitted by hereditary right from father to fon. Its ho-

z Dumont Memoir. Hist. sur Louisiane, i. 175. Charlev. Hist. N. France, iii. 419, &c. Lettr. Edif. 20. 106. 111.

nours and prerogatives were confiderable. Their fubjects paid great respect to the caziques, and executed their orders without hesitation or referve ². They were distinguished by peculiar ornaments, and in order to preserve or augment the veneration of the people, they had the address to call in the aid of superstition to uphold their authority. They delivered their mandates as the oracles of heaven, and pretended to possess the power of regulating the seasons, and of dispensing rain or sunshine, according as their subjects as the oracles of them.

jects stood in need of them.

In some parts of the southern continent, the power of the caziques feems to have been as extensive as in the isles. In Bogota, which is now a province of the new kingdom of Granada, there was fettled a nation, more confiderable in number and more improved in the various arts of life, than any in America except the Mexicans and Peruvians. The people of Bogota subsisted chiefly by agriculture. The idea of property was introduced among them, and its rights, fecured by laws, handed down by tradition, and observed with great care b. They lived in towns which may be termed large, when compared with those in other parts of America. They were clothed in a decent manner, and their houses may be termed commodious, when compared with those of the small tribes around them. The effects of this uncommon civilization were confpicuous. Government had affumed a regular form. A jurisdiction was established, which took cognizance of different crimes, and punished them with rigour. A distinction of ranks was known; their chief, to whom the Spaniards gave the title of monarch, and who merited that name on account of his fplendour as well as power, reigned with absolute authority. He was attended by officers of various conditions; he never appeared in public without a numerous retinue; he was carried in a fort of palanquin with much pomp, and harbingers went before him to fweep the road and strew it with flowers. This uncommon pomp was supported by presents or taxes received from his subjects, to whom their prince was such an object of veneration, that none of them prefumed to look him directly in the face, or ever approached him but with an averted countenance. There were other tribes on the fame continent, among which, though-far less advanced than the people of Bogota in their progress towards refinement, the freedom and independence, natural to man in his favage flate, was much abridged, and their caziques had assumed extensive authority.

^a Herrera, dec. 1. lib. i. c. 16. lib. iii. c. 44. p. 88. Life of Columb. ch. 32.

^b Piedrahita Hist. de las Conquist. del N. Rayno de Gran. p. 46.

It is not easy to point out the circumstances, or to discover the causes which contributed to introduce and establish among each of those people a form of government so different from that of the tribes around them, and so repugnant to the genius of rude nations. If the persons who had an opportunity of observing them in their original state, had been more attentive and more discerning, we might have received information from their conquerors sufficient to guide us in this inquiry. If the transactions of people, unacquainted with the use of letters, were not involved in impenetrable obscurity, we might have derived some information from this domestic source. But as nothing satisfactory can be gathered, either from the accounts of the Spaniards, or from their own traditions, we must have recourse to conjectures, in order to explain the irregular appearances in the political state of the people whom I have mentioned. As all those tribes which had lost their native liberty and independence were feated in the Torrid Zone, or in countries approaching to it, the climate may be supposed to have had some influence in forming their minds to that servitude, which scems to be the destiny of man in those regions of the globe. But though the influence of climate, more powerful than that of any other natural cause, is not to be overlooked; that alone cannot be admitted as a folution of the point in question. The operations of men are so complex, that we must not attribute the form which they assume, to the force of a single principle or cause. Although despotism be confined in America to the Torrid Zone, and to the warm regions bordering upon it, I have already observed that these countries contain various tribes, fome of which possess a high degree of freedom, and others are altogether unacquainted with the restraints of government. The indolence and timidity peculiar to the inhabitants of the islands, render them so incapable of the fentiments or efforts necessary for maintaining independence, that there is no occasion to fearch for any other cause of their tame submisfion to the will of a superior. The subjection of the Natchez, and of the people of Bogota, seems to have been the consequence of a difference in their state from that of the other Americans. They were fettled nations, refiding constantly in one place. Hunting was not the chief occupation of the former, and the latter feem hardly to have trusted to it for any part of their subfiftence. Both had made fuch progress in agriculture and arts, that the idea of property was introduced in some degree in the one community, and fully established in the other. Among people in this state, avarice and ambition have acquired objects, and have begun to exert their power; views of interest allure the selfish; the defire of pre-eminence excites the enterprising; dominion is courted by both; and passions unknown to man in his favage state prompt the interested and ambitious to encroach on the rights of their fellow-citizens. Motives, with which rude nations are equally unacquainted, induce the people to fubmit tamely to the usurped authority of their superiors. But even among nations in this state, the spirit of subjects could not have been rendered fo obsequious, or the power of rulers so unbounded, without the intervention of superstition. By its fatal influence, the human mind, in every stage of its progress, is depressed, and its native vigour and independence subdued Whoever can acquire the direction of this formidable engine, is fecure of dominion over his species. Unfortunately for the people whose institutions are the subject of inquiry, this power was in the hands of their chiefs. The caziques of the isles could put what responses they pleased

c. 5. p. 25, &c. Gomara, Hist. c. 72.

20

into the mouths of their Cemis or gods; and it was by their interpolition, and in their name, that they imposed any tribute or burden on their people d. The same power and prerogative was exercised by the great chief of the Natchez as the principal minister as well as the representative of the Sun, their deity. The respect which the people of Bogota paid to their monarchs was likewise inspired by religion, and the heir apparent of the kingdom was educated in the innermost recess of their principal temple, under such austere discipline, and with such peculiar rites, as tended to fill his subjects with high sentiments concerning the fanctity of his character, and the dignity of his flation c. Thus superstition, which, in the rudest period of fociety, is either altogether unknown, or wastes its force in childish unmeaning practices, had acquired such an ascendant over those people of America, who had made fome little progress towards refinement, that it became the chief instrument of bending their minds to an untimely fervitude, and fubjected them, in the beginning of their political career, to a despotism hardly less rigorous than that which awaits nations in the last stage of their corruption and decline.

V. After examining the political institutions of the rude nations in America, the next object of attention is their art of war, or their provision for public fecurity and defence. The small tribes dispersed over America are not only independent and unconnected, but engaged in perpetual hostilities with one another f. Though mostly

d Herrera, dec. 1. lib. iii. c. 3. e Piedrahita, p. 27.

f Ribas, Hift, de los Triumph. p. 9.

strangers to the idea of separate property vested in any individual, the rudest of the American nations are well acquainted with the rights of each community to its own domains. This right they hold to be perfect and exclusive, entitling the possession to oppose the encroachment of neighbouring tribes. As it is of the utmost consequence to prevent them from destroying or disturbing the game in their hunting-grounds, they guard this national property with a jealous attention. But as their territories are extensive, and the boundaries of them not exactly ascertained, innumerable subjects of dispute arise, which seldom terminate without bloodshed. Even in this simple and primitive state of society, interest is a source of discord, and often prompts savage tribes to take arms in order to repel or punish such as encroach on the forests or plains, to which they trust for substitute.

But interest is not either the most frequent or

But interest is not either the most frequent or the most powerful motive of the incessant hostilities among rude nations. These must be imputed to the passion of revenge, which rages with such violence in the breast of savages, that eagerness to gratify it may be considered as the distinguishing characteristic of men in their uncivilized state. Circumstances of powerful insluence, both in the interior government of rude tribes, and in their external operations against foreign enemies, concur in cherishing and adding strength to a passion fatal to the general tranquillity. When the right of redressing his own wrongs is left in the hands of every individual, injuries are felt with exquisite sensibility, and vengeance exercised with unrelenting rancour. No time can obliterate the memory of an offence, and it is feldom that it can be expiated but by the blood of the offender. In carrying on their public wars, favage nations are influenced by the fame ideas, and animated with the fame spirit, as in prosecuting private vengeance. In small communities, every man is touched with the injury or affront offered to the body of which he is member, as if it were a personal attack upon his own honour or safety. The desire of revenge is communicated from breast to breast, and foon kindles into rage. As feeble focieties can take the field only in small parties, each warrior is conscious of the importance of his own arm, and feels that to it is committed a confiderable portion of the public vengeance. War, which between extensive kingdoms is carried on with little animofity, is profecuted by fmall tribes with all the rancour of a private quarrel. The refentment of nations is as implacable as that of individuals. It may be diffembled or suppressed, but is never extinguished; and often, when least expected or dreaded, it bursts out with redoubled fury s. When polished nations have obtained the glory of victory, or have acquired an addition of territory, they may terminate a war with honour. But favages are not fatisfied until they extirpate the community which is the object of their hatred. They fight not to conquer, but to destroy. If they engage in hostilities, it is with a resolution never to see the face of the enemy in peace, but to profecute the quarrel with immortal enmity h. The defire of vengeance is the first, and almost the only principle, which a favage inftils into the minds of his children i. This grows up with him as he advances in life; and as his attention is directed to few objects, it acquires a degree of force unknown among men, whose passions are dissipated and weakened by the variety of their occupations and pursuits. The desire of vengeance, which takes possession of the heart of favages, resembles the instinctive rage of an animal, rather than the passion of a man. It turns, with undiscerning fury, even against inanimate objects. If hurt accidentally by a stone, they often seize it in a transport of anger, and endeavour to wreak their vengeance upon it k. If ftruck with an arrow in battle, they will tear it from the wound, break and bite it with their teeth, and dash it on the ground 1. With respect to their enemies, the rage of vengeance knows no bounds. When under the dominion of this passion, man becomes the most cruel of all animals. He neither pities, nor forgives, nor spares.

⁸ Boucher, Hist. Nat. de N. France, p. 93. Charlev. Hist. de N. France, iii. 215. 251. Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 204. Creux. Hist. Canad. p. 72. Lozano, Descr. del Gran Chaco, 95. Hennep. Mœurs des Sauv. 40.

The force of this passion is so well understood by the Americans themselves, that they always apply to it, in order to excite their people to take arms. If the elders of any tribe attempt to rouse their youth from sloth, if a chiefwishes to allure a band of warriors to follow

h Charlev. Hist. N. Fr. iii. 251. Colden, i. 108.
ii. 126. Barrere, p. 170. 173.
i. Charlev. Hist.
N. Fr. iii. 326. Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 236. Lozano, Hist.
de Parag. i. 144.
l. Le y ap. de Bry, iii. 190.
l. Ibid. iii. 208. Herrera, dec. 1. lib. vi. c. 8.

him in invading an enemy's country, the most persuasive topics of their martial eloquence are drawn from revenge. "The bones of our countrymen," say they, "lie uncovered; their bloody bed has not been washed clean. Their spirits cry against us; they must be appeased. Let us go and devour the people by whom they were slain. Sit no longer inactive upon your mats; lift the hatchet, console the spirits of the dead, and tell them that they shall be avenged in."

Animated with fuch exhortations, the youth fnatch their arms in a transport of fury, raise the song of war, and burn with impatience to embrue their hands in the blood of their enemies. Private chiefs often assemble small parties, and invade a hostile tribe, without consulting the rulers of the community. A single warrior, prompted by caprice or revenge, will take the field alone, and march several hundred miles to surprise and cut off a straggling enemy n. The exploits of a noted warrior, in such solitary excursions, often form the chief part in the history of an American campaign o; and their elders connive at such irregular sallies, as they tend to cherish a martial spirit, and accustom their people to enterprise and danger p. But when a war is national, and undertaken by public authority, the deliberations are formal and slow. The elders assemble, they deliver their opinions in solemn speeches, they weigh with maturity the nature of the enterprife, and balance its beneficial or difadvantageous confequences with no inconfiderable portion of political difcernment or fagacity. Their priests and foothfayers are confulted, and fometimes they ask the advice even of their women so If the determination be for war, they prepare for it with much ceremony. A leader offers to conduct the expedition, and is accepted. But no man is constrained to follow him; the resolution of the community to commence hostilities, imposes no obligation upon any member to take part in the war. Each individual is still master of his own conduct, and his engagement in the service is perfectly voluntary.

VOL. II.

[&]quot;Charlev. Hist. N. Fr. iii. 216, 217. Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 204. See Note LXV. See Note LXVI.

P. Bossu, i. 140. Lery ap. de Bry, 215. Hennepin, Mœurs des Sauv. 41. Lastau, ii. 169.

The maxims by which they regulate their military operations, though extremely different from those which take place among more civilized and populous nations, are well suited to their own political state, and the nature of the country in which they act. They never take the field in numerous bodies, as it would require a greater effort of foresight and industry, than is usual among savages, to provide for their subsistence, during a march of some hundred miles through dreary forests, or during a long voyage upon their lakes and rivers. Their armies are not encumbered with baggage or military stores. Each warrior, besides his arms, carries a mat and a small bag of pounded maize, and with these is completely equipped for any service. While at a distance from the enemy's frontier, they disperse through the woods, and support them.

⁹ Charlev. Hist. N. Fr. 215. 268. Biet. 367. 380.

r Charley. Hift. N. Fr. 217, 218.

felves with the game which they kill, or the fish which they catch. As they approach nearer to the territories of the nation which they intend to attack, they collect their troops, and advance with greater caution. Even in their hottest and most active wars, they proceed wholly by stratagem and ambuscade. They place not their glory in attacking their enemies with open force. To furprise and destroy is the greatest merit of a commander, and the highest pride of his followers. War and hunting are their only occupations, and they conduct both with the same spirit and the same arts. They follow the track of their enemies through the forest. They endeavour to discover their haunts, they lurk in some thicket near to these, and, with the patience of a sportsman lying in wait for game, will continue in their station day after day, until they can rush upon their prey when most secure, and least able to resist them. If they meet no flraggling party of the enemy, they advance towards their villages, but with fuch folicitude to conceal their own approach, that they often creep on their hands and feet through the woods, and paint their skins of the same colour with the withered leaves, in order to avoid detection s. If fo fortunate as to remain unobserved, they fet on fire the enemy's huts in the dead of night, and maffacre the inhabitants, as they fly naked and defenceless from the flames. If they hope to effect a retreat without being pursued, they carry off some prisoners, whom they referve for a more dreadful fate. But if, notwithstanding all their address and precautions, they find that their motions are discovered, that the enemy has taken the alarm, and is prepared to oppose them, they usually deem it most prudent to retire. They regard it as extreme folly to meet an enemy who is on his guard, upon equal terms, or to give battle in an open field. The most distinguished success is a disgrace to a leader if it has been purchased with any considerable loss of his followers t; and they never boast of a victory, if stained with the blood of their own countrymen w. To fall in battle, instead of being reckoned an honourable death, is a misfortune which subjects the memory of a warrior to the imputation of rashness or imprudence x.

Charlev. Hist. N. Fr. iii. 237, 238. Hennep. Mœurs des Sauv. p. 59.

This fystem of war was universal in America, and the small uncivilized tribes, dispersed through all its different regions and climates, display more craft than boldness in carrying on their hostilities. Struck with this conduct, so opposite to the ideas and maxims of Europeans, several authors contend that it slows from a feeble and dastardly spirit peculiar to the Americans, which is incapable of any generous or manly exertion. But when we reflect that many of these tribes, on occasions which call for extraordinary efforts, not only defend themselves with obstinate resolution, but attack their enemies with the most daring courage, and that they posses fortitude of mind superior to the sense of danger or the t See Note LXVII. u Charlev. Hist. N. Fr. iii. 238. 307. Biet. 381. Lasitau, Mœurs des Sauv. ii. 248. x Charlev. iii. 376. See Note LXVIII. y Recherches Philos. sur les Americ. i. 115. Voyage de March. iv. 410.

fear of death, we must ascribe their habitual caution to fome other cause than constitutional timidity z. The number of men in each tribe is fo small, the difficulty of rearing new members, amidst the hardships and dangers of savage life, so great, that the life of a citizen is extremely precious, and the preservation of it becomes a capital object in their policy. Had the point of honour been the fame among the feeble American tribes as among the powerful nations of Europe, had they been taught to court fame or victory in contempt of danger and death, they must have been ruined by maxims so ill adapted to their condition. But wherever their communities are more populous, fo that they can act with confiderable force, and can fustain the loss of feveral of their members, without being fenfibly weakened, the military operations of the Americans more nearly resemble those of other nations. The Brafilians, as well as the tribes fituated upon the banks of the river De la Plata, often take the field in fuch numerous bodies, as deferve the name of armies a. They defy their enemies to the combat, engage in regular battles, and maintain the conflict with that defperate ferocity, which is natural to men, who, having no idea of war but that of exterminating their enemies, never give or take quarter b. In the powerful empires of Mexico and Peru, great armies were assembled, frequent battles were fought, and the theory as well as practice of war were different from what took place in those petty societies which assume the name of nations.

those E 3

² Lafitau, Mœurs des Sauv. ii. 248, 249. Charlev. N. a Fabri Veriss. Descrip. Indiæ ap de: Fr. iii. 307. b See Note LXIX. Bry, vii. p. 42. 210713

But though vigilance and attention are the qualities chiefly requifite, where the object of war is to deceive and to surprise; and though the Americans, when acting fingly, difplay an amazing degree of address in concealing their own motions, and discovering those of an enemy, yet it is remarkable that, when they take the field in parties, they can feldom be brought to obferve the precautions most effential to their own fecurity. Such is the difficulty of accustoming favages to subordination, or to act in concert; fuch is their impatience under restraint, and such their caprice and prefumption, that it is rarely. they can be brought to conform themselves to the counsels and directions of their leaders. They never station centinels around the place where they rest at night, and after marching fome hundred miles to furprife an enemy, are often furprised themselves, and cut off, while funk in as profound sleep as if they were not within reach of danger c. The state of the s

If, notwithstanding this negligence and security, which often frustrate their most artful schemes, they catch the enemy unprepared, they rush upon them with the utmost serocity, and tearing off the scalps of all those who fall victims to their raged, they carry home those strange trophies in triumph. These they preserve as monuments, not only of their own prowess, but of the vengeance which their arm has inslicted

Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 236, 237. Lettr. Edif. 17. 308.
20. 130. Lafit. Mœurs, ii. 247. Lanontan, ii. 176.

See Note LXX.

B. IV.

upon the people who were objects of public refentment . They are still more folicitous to feize prisoners. During their retreat, if they hope to effect it unmolested, the prisoners are commonly exempt from any infult, and treated with fome degree of humanity, though guarded with the most strict attention.

But after this temporary fuspension, the rage of the conquerors rekindles with new fury. As foon as they approach their own frontier, fome of their number are dispatched to inform their countrymen with respect to the success of the expedition. Then the prisoners begin to feel the wretchedness of their condition. The women of the village, together with the youth who have not attained to the age of bearing arms, affemble, and forming themselves into two lines, through which the prisoners must pass, beat and bruise them with sticks or stones in a cruel manner f. After this first gratification of their rage against their enemies, follow lamentations for the loss of such of their own countrymen as have fallen in the fervice, accompanied with words and actions which feem to express the utmost anguish and grief. But, in a moment, upon a fignal given, their tears cease; they pass, with a sudden and unaccountable transition, from the depths of forrow to transports of joy; and begin to celebrate their victory with all the wild exultation of a barbarous triumph g. The fate of the prisoners remains still undecided. The old men deliberate concerning it. Some are destined to be tortured to death, in order to satiate the revenge of the conquerors; some to replace the members which the community has lost in that or former wars. They who are reserved for this milder fate, are led to the huts of those whose friends have been killed. The women meet them at the door, and if they receive them, their sufferings are at an end. They are adopted into the family, and, according to their phrase, are seated upon the mat of the deceased. They assume his name, they hold the same rank, and are treated thenceforward with all the tenderness due to a father, a brother, a husband, or a friend. But, if either from caprice, or an unrelenting desire of revenge, the women of any family resuse to accept of the prisoner who is offered to them, his doom is fixed. No power can then save him from torture and death.

Dillond revenge

Lafitau, Mœurs, ii. 256. Lahontan, ii. 184. Charlev. Hift, N. Fr. iii. 241. Lafitau, Mœurs, ii. 264.

While their lot is in suspense, the prisoners themselves appear altogether unconcerned about what may befal them. They talk, they eat, they fleep, as if they were perfectly at eafe, and no danger impending. When the fatal fentence is intimated to them, they receive it with an unaltered countenance, raife their death-fong, and prepare to fuffer like men. Their conquerors affemble as to a folemn festival, resolved to put the fortitude of the captive to the utmost proof. A scene ensues, the bare description of which is enough to chill the heart with horror, wherever men have been accustomed, by milder institutions, to respect their species, and to melt into tenderness at the fight of human sufferings. The prisoners are tied naked to a stake, but so as to be at liberty to move round it. All who are prefent, men, women, and children, rush upon them them like furies. Every species of torture is applied that the rancour of revenge can invent. Some burn their limbs with red-hot irons, some mangle their bodies with knives, others tear their flesh from their bones, pluck out their nails by the roots, and rend and twift their finews. They vie with one another in refinements of torture. Nothing fets bounds to their rage but the dread of abridging the duration of their vengeance by hastening the death of the sufferers; and such is their cruel ingenuity in tormenting, that by avoiding industriously to hurt. any vital part, they often prolong this scene of anguish for several days. In spite of all that they fuffer, the victims continue to chant their death-fong with a firm voice, they boast of their own exploits, they infult their tormentors for their want of skill in avenging their friends and relations, they warn them of the vengeance which awaits them on account of what they are now doing, and excite their ferocity by the most provoking reproaches and threats. To display undaunted fortitude in such dreadful fituations, is the noblest triumph of a warrior. To avoid the trial by a voluntary death, or to shrink under it, is deemed infamous and cowardly. If any one betrays fymptoms of timidity, his tormentors often difpatch him at once with contempt, as unworthy of being treated like a man h. Animated with those ideas, they endure, without a groan, what it feems almost impossible that human nature should fustain. They appear to be not only infensible of pain, but to court it. "Forbear," faid an aged chief of the h De le Potherie, ii. 237. iii. 48.

Iroquois, when his infults had provoked one of his tormentors to wound him with a knife, "forbear these stabs of your knife, and rather let me die by fire, that those dogs, your allies, from beyond the sea, may learn by my example to suffer like men'." This magnanimity, of which there are frequent instances among the American warriors, instead of exciting admiration, or calling forth sympathy, exasperates the sierce spirits of their torturers to fresh acts of cruelty ". Weary at length of contending with men, whose constancy of mind they cannot vanquish, some chief in a rage puts a period to their sufferings, by dispatching them with his dagger or club."

This barbarous scene is often succeeded by one no less shocking. As it is impossible to appease the fell spirit of revenge which rages in the heart of a savage, this frequently prompts the Americans to devour those unhappy persons, who have been the victims of their cruelty. In the ancient world, tradition has preserved the memory of barbarous nations of cannibals, who fed on human sless. But in every part of the New World there were people to whom this custom was familiar. It prevailed in the southern continent m, in several of the islands n.

i Colden, Hist. of Five Nations, i. 200. k Voyages de Lahont. i. 236. l Charlev. Hist. N. Fr. iii. 243, &c. 385. Lasitau, Mœurs, ii. 265. Creuxij, Hist. Canad. p. 73. Hennep. Mœurs des Sauv. p. 64, &c. Lahont. i. 233, &c. Tertre, ii. 405. De la Potherie, ii. 22, &c. m Stadius ap. de Bry, iii. 123. Lery, ibid. 210. Biet. 384. Lettr. Edif. 23. 341. Piso, 8. Condam. 84. 97. Ribas, Hist. de los Triumph. 473. n Lise of Columb. 529. Mart. Dec. p. 18. Tertre, ii. 405.

and in various districts of North America . Even in those parts, where circumstances, with which we are unacquainted, had in a great measure abolished this practice, it seems formerly to have been fo well known, that it is incorporated into the idiom of their language. Among the Iroquois, the phrase by which they express their resolution of making war against an enemy is, "Let us go and eat that nation." If they solicit the aid of a neighbouring tribe, they invite it to " eat broth made of the flesh of their enemies P." Nor was the practice peculiar to rude unpolished tribes; the principle from which it took rife is fo deeply rooted in the minds of the Americans, that it subsisted in Mexico, one of the civilized empires in the New World, and relics of it may be discovered among the more mild inhabitants of Peru. It was not fcarcity of food, as fome authors imagine, and the importunate cravings of hunger, which forced the Americans to those horrid repasts on their fellow-creatures. Human flesh was never used as common food in any country, and the various relations concerning people who reckoned it among the stated means of subsistence, flow from the credulity and mistakes of travellers. The rancour of revenge first prompted men to this barbarous action q. The fiercest tribes devoured none but prisoners taken in war, or such

O Dumont, Mem. i. 1254. Charlev. Hist. N. Fr. i. 259.
ii. 14. iii. 21. De la Potherie, iii. 50. P Charlev. Hist.
N. Fr. 208, 209. Lettr. Edif. 23. p. 277. De la Potherie, ii. 298. See Note LXXI. A Biet. 383. Blanco, Conversion de Piritu, p. 28. Bancrost, Nat. Hist. of Guiana, p. 259, &c.

as they regarded as enemies r. Women and children who were not the objects of enmity, if not cut off in the fury of their first inroad into an hostile country, seldom suffered by the deliberate effects of their revenge s.

The people of South America gratify their revenge in a manner fomewhat different, but with no less unrelenting rancour. There prifoners, after meeting at their first entrance with the same rough reception as among the North Americans t, are not only exempt from injury, but treated with the greatest kindness. They are feasted and caressed, and some beautiful young women are appointed to attend and solace them. It is not easy to account for this part of their conduct, unless we impute it to a refinement in cruelty. For, while they feem fludious to attach the captives to life, by fupplying them with every enjoyment that can render it agreeable, their doom is irrevocably fixed. On a day appointed, the victorious tribe affembles, the prisoner is brought forth with great folemnity, he views the prepartions for the facrifice with as much indifference as if he himfelf were not the victim, and meeting his fate with undaunted firmness, is dispatched with a fingle blow. The moment he falls, the women feize the body, and dress it for the feast. They besmear their children with the blood, in order to kindle in their bosoms a hatred of their enemies, which is never extinguished, and all join in feeding upon the flesh with amazing greedi-

nefs

Vita di Americo, 84. Tertre, 405. Fermin. Descrip. de Surin. i. 54. t Stadius, ap. de Bry, iii. p. 40. 123.

ness and exultation ". To devour the body of a flaughtered enemy, they deem the most complete and exquisite gratification of revenge. Wherever this practice prevails, captives never escape death, but they are not tortured with the same cruelty as among tribes which are less accustomed to fuch horrid feafts x.

As the constancy of every American warrior may be put to fuch severe proof, the great object of military education and discipline in the New World is to form the mind to sustain it. When nations carry on war with open force, defy their enemies to the combat, and vanquish them by the superiority of their skill or courage, soldiers are trained to be active, vigorous, and enterprising. But in America, where the genius and maxims of war are extremely different, paffive fortitude is the quality in highest estimation. Accordingly, it is early the study of the Americans to acquire sentiments and habits, which will enable them to behave like men, when their resolution shall be put to the proof. As the youth of other nations exercise themselves in feats of activity and force, those of America vie with one another in exhibitions of their patience under fufferings. They harden their nerves by those voluntary trials, and gradually accustom themselves to endure the sharpest pain without complaining. A boy and girl will bind their naked arms together, and place a burning coal between them, in order to try who first discovers such impatience as to shake it off. All the trials, customary in America, when a youth is u Stadius, ap. de Bry, iii. 128, &c. Lery, ibid. 210. x See Note LXXIII. Y Charley. Hift. N. Fr. iii. 307. VOL. II. admitted F

Legal . Di

admitted into the class of warriors, or when a warrior is promoted to the dignity of captain or chief, are accommodated to this idea of manliness. They are not displays of valour, but of patience; they are not exhibitions of their ability to offend, but of their capacity to suffer. Among the tribes on the banks of the Orinoco, if a warrior aspires to the rank of captain, his pro-bation begins with a long fast, more rigid than any ever observed by the most abstemious hermit. At the close of this, the chiefs affemble, each gives him three lashes with a large whip, applied fo vigoroufly, that his body is almost flayed, and if he betrays the least symptom of impatience or even fensibility, he is disgraced for ever, and rejected as unworthy of the honour to which he aspires. After some interval, the constancy of the candidate is proved by a more excruciating trial. He is laid in a hammoc with his hands bound fast, and an innumerable multitude of venomous ants, whose bite occasions exquisite pain, and produces a violent inflammation, are thrown upon him. The judges of his merit stand around the hammoc, and, while these cruel insects fasten upon the most fensible parts of his body, a sigh, a groan, an involuntary motion expressive of what he suffers, would exclude him for ever from the rank of captain. Even after this evidence of his fortitude, it is not deemed to be completely ascertained, but must stand another test more dreadful than any he has hitherto undergone. He is again suspended in his hammoc, and covered with leaves of the palmetto. A fire of flinking herbs is kindled underneath, so as he may feel its heat, and

and be involved in its smoke. Though scorched and almost suffocated, he must continue to endure with the same patient insensibility. Many perish in this rude essay of their firmness and courage, but fuch as go through it with applaufe, receive the enligns of their new dignity with much folemnity, and are ever after regarded as leaders of approved resolution, whose behaviour, in the most trying situations, will do honour to their country 2. In North America, the previous trial of a warrior is neither fo formal, nor fo fevere. Though even there, before a youth is permitted to bear arms, his patience and fortitude are proved by blows, by fire, and by infults, more intolerable to a haughty spirit than both a.

The amazing steadiness with which the Americans endure the most exquisite torments, has induced some authors to suppose that, from the peculiar feebleness of their frame, their fensibility is not fo acute as that of other people; as women, and persons of a relaxed habit, are obferved to be less affected with pain than robust men, whose nerves are more firmly braced. But the constitution of the Americans is not so different, in its texture, from that of the rest of the human species, as to account for this diverfity in their behaviour. It flows from a principle of honour, instilled early and cultivated with fuch care, as to inspire man in his rudest state with an heroic magnanimity, to which philofophy hath endeavoured, in vain, to form him, when more highly improved and polished. This invincible constancy he has been taught to consider as the chief distinction of a man, and the highest attainment of a warrior. The ideas which influence his conduct, and the passions which take possession of his heart, are few. They operate of course with more decisive effect, than when the mind is crowded with a multiplicity of objects, or distracted by the variety of its pursuits; and when every motive that acts with any force in forming the fentiments of a favage, prompts him to fuffer with dignity, he will bear what might feem to be impossible for human patience to fustain. But wherever the fortitude of the Americans is not roused to exertion by their ideas of honour, their feelings of pain are the fame with those of the rest of mankind b. Nor is that patience under fufferings, for which the Americans have been so justly celebrated, an universal attainment. The constancy of many of the victims is overcome by the agonies of torture. Their weakness and lamentations complete the triumph of their enemies, and reflect difgrace upon their own country c.

Charley. Hift. N. Fr. iii. 219.

² Gumilla, ii. 286, &c. Biet. 376, &c.

The perpetual hostilities carried on among the American tribes are productive of very satal effects. Even in seasons of public tranquillity, their impersect industry does not supply them with any supersluous store of provisions; but when the irruption of an enemy desolates their cultivated lands, or disturbs them in their hunting excursions, such a calamity reduces a community, naturally unprovident and destitute of refources, to extreme want. All the people of the district that is invaded are frequently forced to take refuge in woods or mountains, which can afford them little subsistence, and where many of them perish. Notwithstanding their excessive caution in conducting their military operations, and the solicitude of every leader to preserve the lives of his followers, as the rude tribes in America seldom enjoy any interval of peace, the loss of men among them is considerable in proportion to the degree of population. Thus famine and the sword combine in thinning their numbers. All their communities are feeble, and nothing now remains of several nations, which were once considerable, but the name d.

b See Note LXXIV. Charley. Hift. N. Fr.

Sensible of this continual decay, there are tribes which endeavour to recruit their national force when exhausted, by adopting prisoners taken in war, and by this expedient prevent their total extinction. The practice, however, is not universally received. Resentment operates more powerfully among savages, than considerations of policy. Far the greater part of their captives was antiently sacrificed to their vengeance, and it is only since their numbers began to decline sast, that they have generally adopted milder maxims. But such as they do naturalize, renounce for ever their native tribe, and assume the manners as well as passions of the people by whom they are adopted e, so entirely, that they often join them in expeditions against their own countrymen. Such a sudden transition, and so d Charlev. Hist. N. Fr. iii. 202, 203. 429. Gumilla, ii. 227, &c. Charlev. Hist. N. Fr. iii. 245, &c. Laste. ii. 308.

repugnant to one of the most powerful instinct, implanted by nature, would be deemed ftrange among many people; but, among the members of small communities, where national enmity is violent and deep-rooted, it has the appearance of being still more unaccountable. It feems, nowever, to result naturally from the principles upon which war is carried on in America. When nations aim at exterminating their enemies, no exchange of prisoners can ever take place. From the moment one is made a prifoner, his country and his friends confider him as dead f. He has incurred indelible difgrace by fuffering himself to be surprised or to be taken by an enemy; and were he to return home, after fuch a stain upon his honour, his nearest relations. would not receive or even acknowledge that they knew him g. Some tribes were still more rigid, and if a prisoner returned, the infamy which he had brought on his country was expiated, by putting him instantly to death h. As the unfortunate captive is thus an outcast from his own country, and the ties which bound him to it are irreparably broken, he feels less reluctance in forming a new connection with people, who, as an evidence of their friendly fentiments, not only deliver him from a cruel death, but offer to admit him to all the rights of a fellow-citizen. The perfect fimilarity of manners among favage nations facilitates and completes the union, and reduces a captive to transfer not only his allegiance, but his affection, to the community into the bosom of which he is received.

f See Note LXXV. s Lahont. ii, 185, 186.

⁴ Herrera, dec. 3. lib. iv. c. 16. p. 173.

But though war be the chief occupation of men in their rude state, and to excel in it their highest distinction and pride, their inferiority is always manifest when they engage in competition with polished nations. Destitute of that fore-fight which discerns and provides for remote events, strangers to the union and mutual confidence requifite in forming any extensive plan of operations, and incapable of the subordination no less requisite in carrying such plans into execu-tion, savage nations may astonish a disciplined enemy by their valour, but feldom prove formidable to him by their conduct; and whenever the contest is of long continuance, must yield to superior art. The empires of Peru and Mexico, though their progress in civilization, when meafured by the European or Asiatic standards, was inconsiderable, acquired such an ascendancy over the rude tribes around them, that they fubjected most of them with great facility to their power. When the people of Europe overran the various provinces of America, this superiority was still more conspicuous. Neither the courage nor number of the natives could repel a handful. of invaders. The alienation and enmity, prevalent among barbarians, prevented them from uniting in any common scheme of defence, and while each tribe fought separately, all were subdued.

VI. The arts of rude nations unacquainted with the use of metals, hardly merit any attention on their own account, but are worthy of some notice, as far as they serve to display the genius and manners of man in this stage of his progress.

The first distress a savage must feel, will arise from the manner in which his body is affected, by the heat, or cold, or moisture, of the climate under which he lives; and his first care will be to provide some covering for his own defence. In the warmer and more mild climates of America, none of the rude tribes were clothed. To most of them Nature had not even suggested any idea of impropriety in being altogether un-covered k. As under a mild climate there was little need of any defence from the injuries of the air, and their extreme indolence shunned every fpecies of labour to which it was not urged by absolute necessity, all the inhabitants of the isles, and a confiderable part of the people on the continent, remained in this state of naked simplicity. Others were satisfied with some slight covering, fuch as decency required. But though naked, they were not unadorned. They dressed their hair in many different forms. They fastened bits of gold, or shells, or shining stones, in their ears, their nofes, and cheeks! They stained their skins with a great variety of figures; and they spent much time, and submitted to great pain, in ornamenting their persons in this fantastic manner. Vanity, however, which finds endless occupation for ingenuity and invention, in nations where dress has become a complex and intricate art, is circumfcribed within fo narrow bounds, and confined to fo few articles among naked favages, that they are not fatisfied with those simple decorations, and have a wonderful propensity to alter the natural form of their bodies, in order to render it (as they imagine) more perfect and beautiful. This practice was univerfal among the rudest of the American tribes. Their operations for that purpose begin as foon as an infant is born. By compressing the bones of the skull, while still foft and slexible, fome flatten the crown of their heads; fome squeeze them into the shape of a cone; others mould them as much as possible into a square figure m; and they often endanger the lives of their posterity by their violent and absurd efforts to derange the plan of Nature, or to improve upon her designs. But in all their attempts either to adorn or to new-model their persons, it feems to have been less the object of the Americans to please, or to appear beautiful, than to give an air of dignity and terror to their af-pect. Their attention to drefs had more reference to war than to gallantry. The difference in rank and estimation between the two sexes was fo great, as feems to have extinguished, in fome measure, their folicitude to appear mutually amiable. The man deemed it beneath him to adorn his person, for the sake of one on whom he was accustomed to look down as a slave. was when the warrior had in view to enter the council of his nation, or to take the field against its enemies, that he affumed his choicest ornaments, and decked his person with the nicest

k Lery Navigat. ap. de Bry, iii. p. 164. Life of Columbus, c. 24. Venegas Hist. of Californ. p. 70.

Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 165. Lettr. Edifiantes, 20. 223.

derful

m Oviedo, Hist. lib. iii. c. 5. Ulloa, i. 329. Voyage de Labat, ii 72. Charlevoix, iii. 323. Gumilla, i. 197, &c. Acugna, Relat. de la Riv. des Amaz. ii. 83. Lawson's Voyage to Carolina, p. 33.

care n. The decorations of the women were few and fimple; whatever was precious or splendid was referved for the men. In feveral tribes the women were obliged to fpend a confiderable part of their time every day in adorning and painting their husbands, and could bestow little attention upon ornamenting themselves. Among a race of men so haughty as to despise, or so cold as to neglect them, the women naturally became careless and slovenly, and the love of finery and shew, which had been deemed their favourite passion, was confined chiefly to the other fex o. To deck his person was the distinction of a warrior, as well as one of his most serious occupations P. In one part of their dress, which, at first fight, appears the most fingular and capricious, the Americans have discovered confiderable fagacity in providing against the chief inconveniencies of their climate, which is often fultry and moift to excess. All the different tribes, which remain unclothed, are accustomed to anoint and rub their bodies with the greafe of animals, with viscous gums, and with oils of different kinds. By this they check that profuse perspiration, which, in the torrid zone, wastes the vigour of the frame, and abridges the period of human life. By this too, they provide a defence against the extreme moisture during the n Wafer's Voyage, p. 142. Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 167. Charlev. Hitt. N. Fran. iii. 216. 222.

O Charlev. Hist de la Nouv. France, iii. 278. 327. Lafitau, ii. 53. Kalm's Voyage, iii. 273. Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 169, 170. Purch, Pilgr. iv. 1287. Ribas, Hist. de los P See NOTE LXXVII. Triumph. &c. 472.

rainy feason q. They likewise, at certain feasons, temper paint of different colours with those unctuous substances, and bedaub themselves plentisully with that composition. Sheathed with this impenetrable varnish, their skins are not only protected from the penetrating heat of the sun, but, as all the innumerable tribes of insects have an antipathy to the smell or taste of that mixture, they are delivered from their teazing persecution, which amidst forests and marshes, especially in the warmer regions, would have been altogether intolerable in a state of persect nakedness.

The next object to dress that will engage the attention of a favage, is to prepare some habitation which may afford him shelter by day, and a retreat at night. Whatever is connected with his ideas of perfonal dignity, whatever bears any reference to his military, character, the favage warrior deems an object of importance. Whatever relates only to peaceable and inactive life, he views with indifference. Hence, though finically attentive to drefs, he is little folicitous about the elegance or disposition of his habitation. Savage nations, far from that state of improvement, in which the mode of living is considered as a mark of distinction, and unacquainted with those wants which require a variety of accommodation, regulate the conftruction of their houses according to their limited ideas of necessity. Some of the American tribes were so extremely rude, and had advanced fo little beyond the primeval fimplicity of Nature, that they had no houses at all. During the day, they take shelter from the scorching rays of the sun under thick trees; at night they form a shed with their branches and leaves s. In the rainy feafon they retire into coves, formed by the hand of Nature, or hollowed out by their own industry. Others, who have no fixed abode, and roam through the forest in quest of game, sojourn in temporary huts, which they erect with little labour, and abandon without any concern. The inhabitants of those vast plains, which are deluged by the overflowing of rivers during the heavy rains that fall periodically between the tropies, raife houses upon piles fastened in the ground, or place them among the boughs of trees, and are thus fafe amidst that wide-extended inundation which furrounds them ". Such were the first essays of the rudest Americans towards providing them-felves with habitations. But even among tribes which are more improved, and whose residence is become altogether fixed, the structure of their houses is extremely mean and simple. They are wretched huts, fometimes of an oblong and fometimes of a circular form, intended merely for shelter, with no view to elegance, and little attention to conveniency. The doors are fo low, that it is necessary to bend or to creep on the hands and feet in order to enter them. They are without windows, and have a large hole in the middle of the roof, to convey out the smoke.

i. 190. 202. Bancroft, Nat. Hist. of Guiana, 81. 280.

See Note LXXIX.

Venegas, Hist. of Califor. i. 76. Lozano, Descrip. del Gran Chaco, p. 55. Lettres Edif. ii. 176. Gumilla, i. 383. Bancrost Nat. Hist. of Guiana, 277.

225. Herrera, dec. 1. lib. ix. c. 6. Oviedo Sommar, p. 53, C.

To follow travellers in other minute circumflances of their description, is not only beneath the dignity of history, but would be foreign to the object of my researches. One circumstance merits attention, as it is fingular, and illustrates the character of the people. Some of their houses are so large as to contain accommodation for fourscore or a hundred persons. These are built for the reception of different families, which dwell together under the fame roof x, and often around a common fire, without feparate apartments, or any kind of screen or partition between the spaces which they respectively occupy. As foon as men have acquired distinct ideas of property; or when they are fo much attached to their females, as to watch them with care and jealoufy; families of course divide and fettle in separate houses, where they can secure and guard whatever they wish to preserve. This fingular mode of habitation among feveral people of America may therefore be confidered not only as the effect of their imperfect notions concerning property, but as a proof of inattention and indifference towards their women. If they had not been accustomed to perfect equality, fuch an arrangement could not have taken place. If their fensibility had been apt to have taken alarm, they would not have trusted the virtue of their women amidst the temptations and opportunities of fuch a promiscuous intercourse. At the same time, the perpetual concord which reigns in habitations where so many families are crowded together, is furprifing, and affords a striking evidence that they must be people of either a very gentle, or of a very phlegmatic temper, who, in fuch a fituation, are unacquainted with animosity, brawling, and difcord,

X See NOTE LXXX.

After making fome provision for his dress and habitation, a savage will perceive the necesfity of preparing proper arms with which to affault or repel an enemy. This, accordingly, has early exercifed the ingenuity and invention of all rude nations. The first offensive weapons were doubtlefs fuch as chance prefented, and the first efforts of art to improve upon thefe, were extremely awkward and fimple. Clubs made of fome heavy wood, flakes hardened in the fire, lances whose heads were armed with flint or the bones of fome animal, are weapons known to the rudest nations. All these, however, were of use only in close encounter. But men wished to annoy their enemies while at a distance, and the bow and arrow is the most early invention for this purpose. This weapon is in the hands of people, whose advances in improvement are extremely inconsiderable, and is familiar to the inhabitants of every quarter of the globe. It is remarkable, however, that fome tribes in America were fo destitute of art and ingenuity, that they had not attained to the discovery of this fimple invention z, and feem to have been unacquainted with the use of any missive weapon. The fling, though in its construction not more complex than the bow, and among many nations of equal antiquity, was little known to the people of North America2, or the islands, but appears to have been used by a few tribes in the fouthern continent b. The people, in some provinces of Chili, and those of Patagonia, towards the southern extremity of America, use a weapon peculiar to themselves. They fasten stones, about the fize of a fift, to each end of a leather thong, of eight feet in length, and fwinging these round their heads, throw them with such dexterity, that they feldom miss the object at which they aim c.

2 Piedrahita, Conq. del Nuevo Reyno, ix. 12.

y Journ. de Grillet & Bechamel dans la Goyane, p. 65. Lafitau Mœurs, ii. 4. Torquem. Monarq. i. 247. Journal, Hist. de Joutal, 217. Lery, Hist. Brasil, ap. de Bry, iii. 238. Lozano, Descr. del Gran Chaco, 67.

Among people who had hardly any occupation but war or hunting, the chief exertions of their invention 4, as well as industry, were naturally directed towards these objects. With respect to every thing else, their wants and desires were so limited, that their invention was not upon the stretch. As their food and habitations are perfectly simple, their domestic utenfils are few and rude. Some of the fouthern tribes had discovered the art of forming vessels of earthen ware, and baking them in the fun, fo as they could endure the fire. In North America, they hollowed a piece of hard wood into the form of a kettle, and filling it with water, brought it to boil, by putting red-hot stones into it c. These vessels they used in preparing part of their pro-visions; and this may be considered as a step to-

SOLVED!

Nauf. de Alv. Nun Cabeca de vaca, c. x. p. 12.

Piedrah, p. 16. See Note LXXXI. Ovalle's b Piedrah. p. 16. See NOTE LXXXI. Relation of Chili. Church. Collect. iii. 82. Falkner's Descript. of Patagon. p. 130.

Charley, Hift. N. Fr. iii. 332.

wards refinement and luxury, for men in their rudest state were not acquainted with any method of dressing their victuals, but by roasting them on the fire; and among feveral tribes in America, this is the only species of cookery yet known f. But the master-piece of art, among the favages of America, is the construction of their canoes. An Eskimaux, shut up in his boat of whalebone, covered with the skins of feals, can brave that stormy ocean, on which the barrenness of his country compels him to depend for the chief part of his subsistence s. The people of Canada venture upon their rivers and lakes, in boats made of the bark of trees, and fo light that two men can carry them, wherever shallows or cataracts obstruct the navigation h. In these frail vessels they undertake and accomplish long voyages. The inhabitants of the isles and of the southern continent form their canoes by hollowing the trunk of a large tree, with infinite labour, and though in appearance they are extremely awkward and unwieldy, they paddle and fleer them with fuch dexterity, that Europeans, well acquainted with all the improvements in the science of navigation, have been astonished at the rapidity of their motion, and the quickness of their evolutions. Their pirogues, or war-boats, are so large as to carry forty or fifty men; their canoes employed in fishing and in short voyages are less capaciousk. The form, as well as materials of all these various kinds of vessels, is well adapted to the

tervice

f See Note LXXXIII.

See Note LXXXIV.
Lafitau, Mœurs, &c.
Labat, Voyages, ii. 91, &c. 131.

fervice for which they are destined; and the more minutely they are examined, the mechanism of their structure, as well as neatness of their fabric, will appear the more surprising.

But, in every attempt towards industry among the Americans, one striking quality in their character is conspicuous. They apply to work without ardour, carry it on with little activity, and, like children, are easily diverted from it. Even in operations which feem the most interesting, and where the most powerful motives urge them to vigorous exertions, they labour with a languid liftlefiness. Their work advances under their hand with fuch flowness, that an eye-withess compares it to the imperceptible progress of vegetation 1. They will fpend fo many years in forming a canoe, that it often begins to rot with age before they finish it. They will suffer one part of a roof to decay and perish, before they complete the other m. The slightest manual operation confumes an amazing length of time, and what in polished nations would hardly be an effort of industry, is among favages an arduous undertaking. This flowness of the Americans in executing works of every kind may be imputed to various causes. Among savages, who do not depend for subfishence upon the efforts of regular industry, time is of so little importance, that they fet no value upon it; and provided they can finish a design, they never regard how long they are employed about it. The tools which they employ are so awkward and

¹ Gumilla, ii. 297.

m Borde, Relat. des Caraibes, p. 22.

defective, that every work in which they engage must necessarily be tedious. The hand of the most industrious and skilful artist, were it furnished with no better instrument than a stone hatchet, a shell, or the bone of some animal, would find it difficult to perfect the most simple work. It is by length of labour, that he must endeavour to supply his defect of power. But above all, the cold phlegmatic temper peculiar to the Americans renders their operations languid. It is almost impossible to rouse them from that: habitual indolence in which they are funk; and, unless when engaged in war or hunting, they feem incapable of exerting any vigorous effort. Their ardour of application is not so great as to call forth that inventive spirit which suggests expedients for facilitating and abridging labour. They will return to a task day after day, but all their methods of executing it are tedious and operose ". Even since the Europeans have communicated to them the knowledge of their instruments, and taught them to imitate their arts, the peculiar genius of the Americans is conspicuous in every attempt they make. They may be patient and affiduous in labour, they can copy with a fervile and minute accuracy, but discover little invention, and no talents for dispatch. In spite of instruction and example, the spirit of the race predominates; their motions are naturally tardy, and it is in vain to urge them to quicken their pace. Among the Spaniards in America, the work of an Indian is a phrase by which they describe any thing, in the execution of which an immense time has been employed, and much labour wasted °.

VII. No circumstance respecting rude nations has been the object of greater curiofity than their religious tenets and rites; and none, perhaps, has been fo imperfectly understood, or represented with so little fidelity. Priests and missionaries are the persons who have had the best opportunities of carrying on this inquiry, among the most uncivilized of the American tribes. Their minds, engroffed by the doctrines of their own religion, and habituated to its institutions, are apt to discover something which refembles those objects of their veneration, in the opinions and rites of every people. What-ever they contemplate, they view through one medium, and draw and accommodate it to their own fystem. They study to reconcile the institutions, which fall under their observation, to their own creed, not to explain them according to the rude notions of the people themselves. They ascribe to them ideas which they are incapable of forming, and suppose them to be acquainted with principles and facts, which it is impossible that they should know. Hence some missionaries have been induced to believe, that even among the most barbarous nations in America, they had discovered traces, no less distinct than amazing, of their acquaintance with the fublime mysteries and peculiar institutions of Christianity. From their own interpretation of certain expressions and ceremonies, they have concluded that these people had some knowledge of the doctrine of the Trinity, of the incarnation of the Son of God, of his expiatory facrifice, of the virtue of the crofs, and of the efficacy of the facraments P. In such unintelligent and credulous guides, we can place little confidence.

Voyages de Ulloa, i, 335. Lettr. Edif. &c. 15. 348.

But, even when we make our choice of conductors, with the greatest care, we must not follow them with implicit faith. An inquiry into the religious notions of rude nations is involved in peculiar intricacies, and we must often pause in order to separate the facts which our informers relate, from the reasonings with which they are accompanied, or the theories which they build upon them. Several pious writers, more attentive to the importance of the subject than to the condition of the people whose sentiments they were endeavouring to discover, have bestowed much unprofitable labour in researches of this nature 4.

There are two fundamental doctrines, upon which the whole fystem of religion, as far as it can be discovered by the light of nature, is established. The one respects the being of a God, the other the immortality of the soul. To discover the ideas of the uncultivated nations under our review with regard to those important points, is not only an object of curiosity, but may afford instruction. To these two articles I shall confine my researches, leaving subordinate opinions, and the detail of local superstitions, to more minute inquirers. Whoever has had any opportunity of examining into the religious opinions of persons in the inferior ranks of life, even in the most enlightened and civilized nations, will find that their system of belief is derived from instruction, not discovered by inquiry. That numerous part of the human species, whose lot is labour, whose principal and almost sole occupation is to fecure subfistence, views the arrangement and operations of Nature with little reflection, and has neither leifure nor capacity for entering into that path of refined and intricate speculation which conducts to the knowledge of the principles of natural religion. In the early and most rude periods of savage life, fuch disquisitions are altogether unknown, When the intellectual powers are just beginning to unfold, and their first feeble exertions are directed towards a few objects of primary necesfity and use; when the faculties of the mind are so limited, as not to have formed abstract or general ideas; when language is fo barren, as to be destitute of names to distinguish any thing that is not perceived by some of the senses; it is preposterous to expect that man should be capable of tracing with accuracy the relation between cause and effect; or to suppose that he should rife from the contemplation of the one to the knowledge of the other, and form just conceptions of a Deity, as the Creator and Governor of the universe. The idea of creation is fo familiar wherever the mind is enlarged by science, and illuminated with revelation, that we feldom reflect how profound and abstrufe this idea is, or consider what progress man must have made in observation and research, before he could arrive at any knowledge of this elementary principle principle in religion. Accordingly, feveral tribes have been discovered in America, which have no idea whatever of a Supreme Being, and no rites of religious worship. Inattentive to that magnificent spectacle of beauty and order prefented to their view, unaccustomed to reflect either upon what they themselves are, or to inquire who is the author of their existence, men, in their favage state, pass their days like the animals round them, without knowledge or veneration of any fuperior power. Some rude tribes have not in their language any name for the Deity, nor have the most accurate observers been able to discover any practice or institution which feemed to imply that they recognifed his authority, or were folicitous to obtain his favour. It is however only among men in the most uncultivated state of nature, and while their intellectual faculties are so feeble and limited as hardly to elevate them above the irrational creation, that we discover this total infensibility to the impressions of any invisible

P Venegas, i. 88. 92. Torquemada, ii. 445. Garcia, Crigen. 122. Herrera, dec. 4. lib. ix. c. 7. dec. 5. lib. iv. c. 7.

But the human mind, formed for religion, foon opens to the reception of ideas, which are deftined, when corrected and refined, to be the r Biet, 539. Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 221. Nieuhoff. Church. Coll. ii. 132. Lettr. Edif. 2. 177. Id. 12, 13. Venegas, 1. 87. Lozano, Descript. del Gran Chaco, 59. Fernand. Mission. de Chiquit. 39. Gumilla, ii. 156. Rochesort, Hist. des Antilles, p. 468. Margrave, Hist. in Append. de Chiliensibus, 286. Ulloa Notic. Americ. 335, &c. Barrere, 218, 219. Harcourt, Voy. to Guiana. Purch. Pilgr. iv. p. 1273. Account of Brasil, by a Portuguese. Ibid. p. 1289. Jones's Journal, p. 59. See Note LXXXVII.

great fource of confolation amidst the calamities of life. Among some of the American tribes, still in the infancy of improvement, we discern apprehensions of some invisible and powerful beings. These apprehensions are originally indistinct and perplexed, and seem to be suggested rather by the dread of impending evils, than to flow from gratitude for bleffings received. While Nature holds on her course with uniform and undisturbed regularity, men enjoy the benefits resulting from it, without inquiring concerning its cause. But every deviation from this regular course rouses and astonishes them. When they behold events to which they are not accustomed, they fearch for the reasons of them with eager curiosity. Their understanding is unable to penetrate into these; but imagination, a more forward and ardent faculty of the mind, decides without hefitation. It afcribes the extraordinary occurrences in nature to the influence of invisible beings, and supposes that the thunder, the hurricane, and the earthquake, are effects of their interpolition. Some such confused notion of fpiritual or invisible power; superintending over those natural calamites which frequently desolate the earth, and terrify its inhabitants, may be traced among many rude nations s. But besides this, the difasters and dangers of savage life are fo many, and men often find themselves in fituations fo formidable, that the mind, fenfible of its own weakness, has no resource but in the guidance and protection of wisdom and power superior to what is human. Dejected with calamities which oppress him, and exposed to dangers which he cannot repel, the favage no longer relies upon himself; he feels his own impotence, and sees no prospect of being extricated, but by the interposition of some unseen arm. Hence, in all unenlightened nations, the first rites or practices which bear any refemblance to acts of religion, have it for their object to avert evils which men fuffer or dread. The Manitous or Okkis of the North Americans were amulets or charms, which they imagined to be of such virtue, as to preserve the persons who reposed confidence in them from every difastrous event, or they were considered as tutelary spirits, whose aid they might implore in circumstances of distress t. The Cemis of the islanders were reputed by them to be the authors of every calamity that afflicts the human race; they were represented under the most frightful forms, and religious homage was paid to them with no other view than to appeale these furious deities ". Even among those tribes whose religious system was more enlarged, and who had formed fome conception of benevolent beings, which delighted in conferring benefits, as well as of malicious powers prone to inflict evil; fuperstition still appears as the offspring of fear, and all its efforts were employed to avert calamities. They were perfuaded that their good deities, prompted by the beneficence of their nature, would bestow every blessing in their power, without folicitation or acknowledgment; and their only anxiety was to footh

t Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 343, &c. Creuxii, Hist. Canad. p. 82, &c. u Oviedo, lib. iii. c. 1. p. 111. P. Martyr, decad. p. 102, &c.

and deprecate the wrath of the powers whom they regarded as the enemies of mankind *.

Such were the imperfect conceptions of the greater part of the Americans with respect to the interpositions of invisible agents, and such, almost universally, was the mean and illiberal object of their superstitions. Were we to trace back the ideas of other nations to that rude state in which history first presents them to our view, we should discover a surprising resemblance in their tenets and practices; and should be convinced, that, in similar circumstances, the faculties of the human mind hold nearly the same course in their progress, and arrive at almost the same conclusions. The impressions of fear are conspicuous in all the systems of superstition formed in this situation. The most exalted notions of men rise no higher than to a perplexed apprehension of certain beings, whose power, though supernatural, is limited as well as partial.

But, among other tribes, which have been longer united, or have made greater progress in improvement, we discern some feeble pointing towards more just and adequate conceptions of the power that presides in nature. They seem to perceive that there must be some universal cause to whom all things are indebted for their being. If we may judge by some of their expressions, they appear to acknowledge a divine power to be the maker of the world, and the disposer of all events. They denominate him the

VOL. II. H Great

X Tertre, ii. 365. Borde, p. 14. State of Virginia, by a Native, book iii. p. 32, 33. Dumont, i. 165. Bancroft Nat. Hist. of Guiana, 309.

Great Spirit x. But these ideas are faint and confused, and when they attempt to explain them, it is manifest, that among them the word fpirit has a meaning very different from that in which we employ it, and that they have no conception of any deity but what is corporeal. They believe their gods to be of the human form, though of a nature more excellent than man, and retail fuch wild incoherent fables concerning their functions and operations, as are altogether unworthy of a place in history. Even among these tribes, there is no established form of public worship; there are no temples erected in honour of their deities; and no ministers peculiarly consecrated to their service. They have the knowledge, however, of feveral fuperstitious ceremonies and practices handed down to them by tradition, and to these they have recourse with a childish credulity, when roused by any emergence from their usual infensibility, and excited to acknowledge the power, and to implore the protection of superior beings y.

The tribe of the Natchez and the people of Bogota had advanced beyond the other uncultivated nations of America in their ideas of religion, as well as in their political inflitutions; and it is no lefs difficult to explain the caufe of this diffinction than of that which we have already confidered. The Sun was the chief object of religious worship among the Natchez. In their temples, which were constructed with fome magnificence, and decorated with various ornaments, according to their mode of architecture, they preferved a perpetual fire, as the purest emblem of their divinity. Ministers were appointed to watch and feed this facred slame. The first function of the great chief of the nation, every morning, was an act of obeisance to the Sun; and festivals returned at stated seasons, which were celebrated by the whole community with folemn but unbloody rites z. This is the most refined species of superstition known in America, and, perhaps, one of the most natural as well as most feducing. The Sun is the apparent source of the joy, fertility, and life diffused through nature; and while the human mind, in its early essays towards inquiry, contemplates and admires his univerfal and animating energy, its admiration is apt to stop short at what is visible, without reaching to the unfeen cause; and pays that adoration to the most glorious and beneficial work of God, which is due only to him who formed it. As fire is the purest and most active of the elements, and in some of its qualities and effects refembles the Sun, it was, not improperly, chosen to be the emblem of his powerful operation. The ancient Persians, a people far superior, in every respect, to that rude tribe whose rites I am describing, founded their religious system on similar principles, and established a form of public worship, less gross and exceptionable than that of any people destitute of guidance from revelation. This surprising coincidence in fentiment between two nations, in fuch different states of improvement, is one of the many fingular and unaccountable circumstances which occur in the history of human affairs.

^{*} Charley. N. Fr. iii. 343. Sagard, Voy. du Pays des Hurons, 226. Colden, i. 17.

² Dumont, i. 158, &c. Charley. N. Fr. iii. 417, &c. 429. Lafitau, i. 167.

Among the people of Bogota, the Sun and Moon were, likewise, the chief objects of veneration. Their fystem of religion was more regular and complete, though less pure, than that of the Natchez. They had temples, altars, priefts, facrifices, and that long train of ceremonies, which superstition introduces wherever the has fully established her dominion over the minds of men. But the rites of their worship were cruel and bloody. They offered human victims to their deities, and many of their practices nearly refembled the barbarous institutions of the Mexicans, the genius of which we shall have an opportunity of confidering more attentively in its proper place a.

With respect to the other great doctrine of religion, concerning the immortality of the foul, the fentiments of the Americans were more united: the human mind, even when least improved and invigorated by culture, shrinks from the thoughts of annihilation, and looks forward with hope and expectation to a state of future existence. This sentiment, resulting from a secret consciousness of its own dignity, from an instinctive longing after immortality, is universal, and may be deemed natural. Upon this, are founded the most exalted hopes of man in his highest state of improvement; nor has Nature withheld from him this foothing confolation, in the most early and rude period of his progress We can trace this opinion from one extremity of America to the other: in some regions more faint and obscure, in others more perfectly developed, but no where unknown. The most uncivilized of its savage tribes do not apprehend death as the extinction of being. All entertain hopes of a future and more happy state, where they shall be for ever exempt from the calamities which imbitter human life in its present condition. This future state they conceive to be a delightful country, bleffed with perpetual fpring, whose forests abound with game, whose rivers fwarm with fish, where famine is never felt, and uninterrupted plenty shall be enjoyed without labour or toil. But as men, in forming their first imperfect ideas concerning the invisible world, suppose that there they shall continue to feel the same desires, and to be engaged in the fame occupations, as in the present world; they naturally ascribe eminence and distinction, in that state, to the same qualities and talents which are here the object of their esteem. The Americans, accordingly, allotted the highest place, in their country of spirits, to the skilful hunter, to the adventurous and fuccessful warrior, and to fuch as had tortured the greatest number of captives and devoured their flesh b. These notions were so prevalent, that they gave rife to an universal custom, which is, at once, the strongest evidence that the Americans believe in a future state, and the best illustration of what they expect there. As they imagine, that

² Piedrahita, Conq. del N. Reyno, p. 17. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. v. c. 6,

3 departed

b Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 222. Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 351. &c. De la Potherie, ii. 45, &c. iii. 5.

departed spirits begin their career anew in the world whither they are gone, that their friends may not enter upon it defenceless and unprovided, they bury together with the bodies of the dead their bow, their arrows, and other weapons used in hunting or war; they deposit in their tombs the skins or stuffs of which they make garments, Indian corn, manioc, venison, domestic utenfils, and whatever is reckoned among the necessaries in their simple mode of life c. In some provinces, upon the decease of a cazique or chief, a certain number of his wives, of his favourites, and of his flaves, were put to death, and interred together with him, that he might appear with the same dignity in his future. station, and be waited upon by the same attendants d. This perfuasion is so deep rooted, that many of the deceased person's retainers offer themselves as voluntary victims, and court the privilege of accompanying their departed master, as an high distinction. It has been found difficult, on fome occasions, to fet bounds to this enthusiasm of affectionate duty, and to reduce the train of a favourite leader to fuch a number as the tribe could afford to spare e.

Among the Americans, as well as other uncivilized nations, many of the rites and observ-

c Chronica de Cieca de Leon, c. 28. Sagard, 288. Creux. Hist. Canad. p. 91. Rochefort. Hist. des Antilles, 568. Biet, 391. De la Potherie, ii. 44. iii. 8. Blanco, Convers. de Piritu, p. 35. d Dumont, Louisiane, i. 208, &c. Oviedo, lib. v. c. 3. Gomara, Hist. Gen. c. 28. P. Mart. decad. 304. Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 421. Herrera, dec. 1. lib. iii. c. 3. P. Melchior Hernandez, Memor. de Chiriqui. Coll. Orig. Papers, i. Chron. de Cieca de Leon, c. 33.

ances which bear some resemblance to acts of religion, have no connection with devotion, but proceed from a fond defire of prying into futurity. The human mind is most apt to feel, and to discover this vain curiosity, when its own powers are most feeble and uninformed. Astonished with occurrences, of which it is unable to comprehend the cause, it naturally fancies that there is something mysterious and wonderful in their origin. Alarmed at events of which it cannot discern the issue or the confequences, it has recourse to other means of difcovering them, than the exercise of its own fagacity. Wherever superstition is so established as to form a regular system, this desire of penetrating into the secrets of futurity is connected with it. Divination becomes a religious act. Priests, as the ministers of Heaven, pretend to deliver its oracles to men. They are the only foothfayers, augurs, and magicians, who profess the facred and important art of disclosing what is hid from other eyes.

But, among rude nations, who pay no veneration to any superintending power, and who have no established rites or ministers of religion, their curiosity to discover what is suture and unknown is cherished by a different principle, and derives strength from another alliance. As the diseases of men, in the savage state, are (as has been already observed) like those of the animal creation, sew but extremely violent, their impatience under what they suffer, and solicitude for the recovery of health, soon inspired them with extraordinary reverence for such as pretended to understand the nature of their maladies, and to be possessed of knowledge sufficient to preserve or deliver them from their sudden and fatal effects. These ignorant pretenders, however, were such utter strangers to the structure of the human frame, as to be equally unacquainted with the causes of its disorders, and the manner in which they will terminate. Superstition, mingled frequently with fome portion of craft, fupplied what they wanted in science. They imputed the origin of diseases to supernatural influence, and prescribed or persormed a variety of mysterious rites, which they gave out to be of fuch efficacy as to remove the most dangerous and inveterate maladies. The credulity and love of the marvellous, natural to uninformed men, favoured the deception, and prepared them to be the dupes of those impostors. Among savages, their first physicians are a kind of conjurers or wizards, who boast that they know what is past, and can foretell what is to come. Incantations. forcery, and mummeries of diverse kinds, no less strange than frivolous, are the means which they employ to expel the imaginary causes of malignity f; and relying upon the efficacy of thefe, they predict with confidence what will be the fate of their deluded patients. Thus, fuperstition, in its earliest form, slowed from the folicitude of man to be delivered from present distress, not from his dread of evils awaiting him in a future life, and was originally ingrafted on medicine, not on religion. One of the first, and most intelligent historians of America, was flruck with this alliance between the art of di

f P. Melch. Hernandez, Memorial de Chiriqui. Collect. Orig. Pap. i.

vination and that of physic, among the people of Hispaniolas. But this was not peculiar to them. The Alexis, the Piayas, the Autmoins, or whatever was the distinguishing name of their diviners and charmers in other parts of America, were all the physicians of their respective tribes, in the same manner as the Bubitos of Hispaniola. As their function led them to apply to the human mind when enseebled by sickness, and as they found it, in that season of dejection, prone to be alarmed with imaginary sears, or amused with vain hopes, they casily induced it to rely with implicit considence on the virtue of their spells, and the certainty of their predictions h.

Whenever men acknowledge the reality of supernatural power and discernment in one instance, they have a propensity to admit it in others. The Americans did not long suppose the efficacy of conjuration to be consined to one subject. They had recourse to it in every situation of danger or distress. When the events of war were peculiarly disastrous, when they met with unforeseen disappointments in hunting, when inundations or drought threatened their crops with destruction, they called upon their conjurers to begin their incantations, in order to discover the causes of those calamities, or to foretell what would be their issue in the sum of their confidence

Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 361. 364, &c. Lawfon, N. Carol. 214. Ribas, Triumph. p. 17. Biet, 386. De la Potherie, ii. 35, &c.

Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 361. 364, &c. Lawfon, N. Carol. 214. Ribas, Triumph. p. 17. Biet, 386. De la Potherie, ii. 35, &c.

Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 3. Dumont, i. 173. Fernand. Relac. de los Chiquit. p. 40. Lozano, 84. Margrave, 279.

fidence in this delufive art gradually increased, and manifested itself in all the occurrences of life. When involved in any difficulty, or about to enter upon any transaction of moment, every individual regularly consulted the forcerer, and depended upon his instructions to extricate him from the former, as well as to direct his conduct in the latter. Even among the rudest tribes in America, superstition appears in this form, and divination is an art in high esteem. Long before man had acquired fuch knowledge of a deity as inspires reverence, and leads to adoration, we observe him stretching out a presumptuous hand to draw aside that veil with which Providence kindly conceals its purpofes from human knowledge; and we find him labouring, with fruitless anxiety, to penetrate into the mysteries of the divine administration. To discern, and to worship a superintending power, is an evidence of the enlargement and maturity of the human understanding; a vain defire of prying intofuturity, is the error of its infancy, and a proof of its weakness.

From this weakness proceeded likewise the faith of the Americans in dreams, their observation of omens, their attention to the chirping of birds, and the cries of animals, all which they suppose to be indications of suture events, and if any one of these prognostics is deemed unfavourable, they instantly abandon the pursuit of those measures on which they are most eagerly bent k.

k Charlev N. Fr. iii. 262. 353. Stalius, ap. de Bry, iii. 120. Creuxj. Hist. Canad. 84. Techo, Hist. of Parag. Church. Coll. vi. 37. De la Potherie, iii. 6.

VIII. But if we would form a complete idea of the uncultivated nations of America, we must not pass unobserved some singular customs, which, though universal and characteristic, could not be reduced, with propriety, to any of the articles into which I have divided my inquiry concerning their manners.

Among favages, in every part of the globe, the love of dancing is a favourite passion. As, during a great part of their time, they languish in a state of inactivity and indolence, without any occupation to rouse or interest them, they delight univerfally in a pastime which calls forth the active powers of their nature into exercise. The Spaniards, when they first visited America, were altonished at the fondness of the natives for dancing, and beheld with wonder a people, cold and unanimated in most of their other pursuits, kindle into life, and exert themselves with ardour, as often as this favourite amusement recurred. Among them, indeed, dancing ought not to be denominated an amusement. It is a ferious and important occupation, which mingles in every occurrence of public or private life. If any intercourse be necessary between two American tribes, the ambassadors of the one approach in a folemn dance, and prefent the calumet or emblem of peace; the fachems of the other receive it with the same ceremony !. If war is denounced against an enemy, it is by a dance, expressive of the resentment which they feel, and of the vengeance which they meditate m.

¹ De la Potherie Hist. ii. 17, &c. Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 211. 297. La Hontan, i. 100. 137. Hennepin, Decou. 146, &c. m Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 298. Lastau, i. 523.

If the wrath of their gods is to be appeafed, or their beneficence to be celebrated; if they rejoice at the birth of a child, or mourn the death of a friend n, they have dances appropriated to each of these situations, and suited to the different sentiments with which they are then animated. If a person is indisposed, a dance is prescribed as the most effectual means of restoring him to health; and if himself cannot endure the satigue of such an exercise, the physician or conjurer persorms it in his name, as if the virtue of his activity could be transferred to his patient o.

All their dances are imitations of some action; and though the music by which they are regulated is extremely simple and tiresome to the ear by its dull monotony, fome of their dances appear wonderfully expressive and animated. The war dance is, perhaps, the most striking. It is the representation of a complete American campaign. The departure of the warriors from their village, their march into the enemy's country, the caution with which they encamp, the address with which they station some of their party in ambush, the manner of furprising the enemy, the noise and ferocity of the combat, the scalping of those who are slain, the seizing of prisoners, the triumphant return of the conquerors, and the torture of the victims, are fucceffively exhibited. The performers enter with fuch enthusiastic ardour into their several parts, their gestures, their countenance, their voice, are fo wild and fo well adapted to their various n Joutel, 343. Gomara, Hist. Gen. c. 196. O Denys, Hist. Nat. 189. Brickell, 372. De la Potherie, ii. 36. fituations.

fituations, that Europeans can hardly believe it to be a mimic scene, or view it without emotions of fear and horror p.

But however expressive some of the American dances may be, there is one circumstance in them remarkable, and connected with the character of the race. The fongs, the dances, the amuse-ments of other nations, expressive of the senti-ments which animate their hearts, are often ments which animate their hearts, are often adapted to display or excite that sensibility which mutually attaches the sexes. Among some people, such is the ardour of this passion, that love is almost the sole object of session, that love is almost the sole object of session, and joy; and as rude nations are strangers to delicacy, and unaccustomed to disguise any emotion of their minds, their dances are often extremely wanton and indecent. Such is the Calenda, of which the natives of Africa are so passionately fond significant such the feats of the dancing girls, which the Asiatics contemplate with so much avidity of desire. But, among the Americans, more of defire. But, among the Americans, more cold and indifferent to their females, from causes which I have already explained, the passion of love mingles but little with their festivals and pastimes. Their fongs and dances are mostly solemn and martial; they are connected with some of the serious and important affairs of life, and having no relation to love or gallantry are seldom common to the two sexes, but Descript. of N. France, Osborne, Coll. ii, 883. Charlev.

N. Fr. iii. 84.

P De la Potherie, ii. 116. Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 297. Lafitau, i. 523. 9 Adanson, Voyage to Senegal, p. iii. 287. Labat, Voyages, iv. 463. Sloane, Hist. Nat. of Jam. Introd. p. 48. Fermin. Descript, de Surin. i. p. 139.

executed by men and women apart 5. If, on fome occasions, the women are permitted to join in the festival, the character of the entertainment is still the same, and no movement or gesture is expressive of attachment, or encourages familiarity t.

An immoderate love of play, especially at games of hazard, which feems to be natural to all people unaccustomed to the occupations of regular industry, is likewise universal among the Americans. The same causes, which so often prompt persons in civilized life, who are at their ease, to have recourse to this pastime, render it the delight of the savage. The former are independent of labour, the latter do not feel the neceffity of it; and as both are unemployed, they run with transport to whatever is interesting enough to stir and to agitate their minds. Hence the Americans, who at other times are so indifferent, so phlegmatic, so silent, and animated with so few desires, as soon as they engage in play become rapacious, impatient, noify, and almost frantic with eagerness. Their furs, their domestic utenfils, their clothes, their arms, are staked at the gaming-table, and when all is loft, high as their sense of independence is, in a wild emotion of despair or of hope, they will often risk their personal liberty upon a single cast ". Among several tribes, such gaming parties frequently recur, and become their most acceptable entertainment at every great festival. Superstition, which is apt to take hold of those passions which are most vigorous, frequently lends its aid to confirm and strengthen this favourite inclination. Their conjurers are accustomed to prescribe a solemn match at play, as one of the most efficacious methods of appealing their gods, or of restoring the sick to health *.

S Wafer's Account of Ishmus, &c. 169. Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 177. Lozano, Hist. de Parag. i. 149. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. vii. c, 8. dec, 4. lib. x. c. 4. See NOTE XC.

Barrere, Fr. Equin. p. 191. "Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 261. 318. Lasitau, ii. 338, &c. Ribas, Triumf. 13. Brickell, 335.

From causes similar to those which render them fond of play, the Americans are extremely addicted to drunkenness. It feems to have been one of the first exertions of human ingenuity to discover some composition of an intoxicating quality; and there is hardly any nation fo rude, or fo destitute of invention, as not to have succeeded in this fatal refearch. The most barbarous of the American tribes have been fo unfortunate as to attain this art; and even those which are so deficient in knowledge, as to be unacquainted with the method of giving an inebriating strength to liquors by fermentation, can accomplish the fame end by other means. The people of the islands of North America, and of California, used, for this purpose the smoke of tobacco, drawn up with a certain instrument into the nostrils, the fumes of which ascending to the brain, they felt all the transports and frenzy of intoxication y. In almost every other part of the New World, the natives possessed the art of extracting an intoxicating liquor from maize or the manioc root, the same substances which they convert into bread. The operation by which they effect this, nearly refembles the common one of brewing, but with this difference, that in place of yest, they use a nauseous infusion of a certain quantity of maize or manioc chewed by their women. The faliva excites a vigorous fermentation, and in a few days the liquor becomes fit for drinking. It is not difagreeable to the taste, and when swallowed in large quantities, is of an intoxicating quality z. This is the general beverage of the Americans, which they distinguish by various names, and for which they feel such a violent and insatiable desire, as it is not easy either to conceive or describe. Among polished nations, where a succession of various functions and amusements keeps the mind in continual occupation, the defire for ftrong drink is regulated, in a great measure, by the climate, and increases or diminishes according to the variations of its temperature. In warm regions, the delicate and fensible frame of the inhabitants does not require the stimulation of fermented liquors. In colder countries, the constitution of the natives, more robust and more sluggish, stands in need of generous liquors to quicken and animate it. But among favages, the desire of fomething that is of power to intoxicate, is in every fituation the same. All the people of America, if we except some small tribes near the Straits of Magellan, whether natives of the torrid zone, or inhabitants of its more temperate regions, or placed by a harder fate in the fevere climates towards its northern or fouthern extremity, ap-pear to be equally under the dominion of this

^{*} Charley, N. Fr. iii. 262. Y Oviedo, Hist. ap. Ramus. iii. 113. Venegas, i. 68. Nausrag. de Cabeca de Vaca, c. 26. See Note XCl.

z Stadius ap. de Bry, ili. 111. Lery, ibid. 175. / appetite.

appetite 2. Such a fimilarity of taste, among people in such different situations, must be ascribed to the influence of some moral cause, and cannot be confidered as the effect of any phyfical or constitutional want. While engaged in war or in the chase, the savage is often in the most interesting situations, and all the powers of his nature are roused to the most vigorous exertions. But those animating scenes are succeeded by long intervals of repose, during which the warrior meets with nothing that he deems. of fufficient dignity or importance to merit his attention. He languishes and mopes in this feafon of indolence. The posture of his body is an emblem of the state of his mind. In one climate, cowering over the fire in his cabin; in another, stretched under the shade of some tree, he doses away his time in sleep, or in an unthinking joyless inactivity, not far removed from it. As strong liquors awake him from this torpid state, give a brisker motion to his spirits, and enliven him more thoroughly than either dancing or gaming, his love of them is excessive. A favage, when not engaged in action, is a penfive melancholy animal; but as foon as he tastes, or has a prospect of tasting, the intoxicating draught, he becomes gay and frolicsome b. Whatever be the occasion or pretext on which the Americans affemble, the meeting always terminates in a debauch. Many of their festivals

² Gumilla, i. 257. Lozano, Descrip. del Gran Chaco, 56. 103. Ribas, 8. Ulloa, i. 249. 337. Marchais, iv. 436. Fernandez, Mission. de los Chiquet. 35. Barrere, p. 203. Blanco Convers. de Piritu, 31.

Description

Melendez

Tesorez Verdad, iii. 369.

have no other object, and they welcome the return of them with transports of joy. As they are not accustomed to restrain any appetite, they fet no bounds to this. The riot often continues without intermission several days; and whatever may be the fatal effects of their excess, they never cease from drinking as long as one drop of liquor remains. The persons of greatest eminence, the most distinguished warriors, and the chiefs most renowned for their wisdom, have no greater command of themselves than the most obscure member of the community. Their eagerness for present enjoyment renders them blind to its fatal consequences; and those very men, who, in other fituations, feem to possess a force of mind more than human, are in this instance inferior to children in forefight, as well as confideration, and mere flaves of brutal appetite c. When their passions, naturally strong, are heightened and inflamed by drink, they are guilty of the most enormous outrages, and the: festivity feldom concludes without deeds of violence or bloodshed d.

But, amidst this wild debauch, there is one circumstance remarkable; the women, in most of the American tribes, are not permitted to partake of it. Their province is to prepare the liquor, to serve it about to the guests, and to take care of their husbands and friends, when their reason is overpowered. This exclusion of the women from an enjoyment so highly valued by savages, may be justly considered as a mark of their inferiority, and as an additional evidence of that contempt with which they were treated in the New World. The people of North America, when first discovered, were not acquainted with any intoxicating drink; but as the Europeans early found it their interest to fupply them with spirituous liquors, drunkenness foon became as universal among them as among their countrymen to the fouth; and their women having acquired this new taste, indulge it with as little decency and moderation as the men f.

CRibas, 9. Ulloa, i. 338. d Lettr. Edif. ii. 178. Torquemada, Mond. Ind. i. 335. See Note XCII.

It were endless to enumerate all the detached customs which have excited the wonder of travellers in America: but I cannot omit one feemingly as fingular as any that has been mentioned. When their parents and other relations become old, or labour under any distemper which their slender knowledge of the healing art cannot remove, the Americans cut short their days with a violent hand, in order to be relieved from the burden of supporting and tending them. This practice prevailed among the ruder tribes in every part of the continent, from Hudfon's Bay to the river De la Plata; and however shocking it may be to those sentiments of tenderness and attachment, which, in civilized life, we are apt to consider as congenial with our frame, the condition of man in the savage state. leads and reconciles him to it. The fame hardships and difficulty of procuring subsistence, which deter favages, in some cases, from rearing their children, prompt them to destroy the aged and infirm. The declining state of the one is.

f Hutchinson, Hist. of Massachus. 469. Lasitau, ii. 125. Sagard, 146. 1. 18

as helpless as the infancy of the other. The former are no less unable than the latter to perform the functions that belong to a warrior or hunter, or to endure those various distresses in which favages are fo often involved, by their own want of forefight and industry. Their relations feel this, and, incapable of attending to the wants or weaknesses of others, their impatience under an additional burden prompts them to extinguish that life which they find it difficult to fustain. This is not regarded as a deed of cruelty, but as an act of mercy. An American, broken with years and infirmities, conscious that he can no longer depend on the aid of those around him, places himself contentedly in his grave; and it is by the hands of his children or nearest relations that the thong is pulled, or the blow inflicted, which releases him for ever from the forrows of life g.

IX. After contemplating the rude American tribes in such various lights, after taking a view of their customs and manners from so many different stations, nothing remains but to form a general estimate of their character, compared with that of more polished nations. A human being, as he comes originally from the hand of Nature, is every where the same. At his first appearance in the state of infancy, whether it be among the rudest savages, or in the most civilized nation, we can discern no quality which marks any distinction or superiority. The capacity of improvement seems to be the same; and the talents he may afterwards acquire, as well as the virtues he may be rendered capable of exercifing, depend, in a great measure, upon the state of society in which he is placed. To this state his mind naturally accommodates itself, and from it receives discipline and culture. In proportion to the wants which it accustoms a human being to feel, and the functions in which these engage him, his intellectual powers are called forth. According to the connections which it establishes between him and the rest of his species, the affections of his heart are exerted. It is only by attending to this great principle; that we can discover what is the character of man in every different period of his progress.

well

⁸ Cassani, Histor, de N. Reyno de Gran, p. 300. Piso, p. 6. Eilis, Voy. 191. Gumilla, i. 333.

If we apply it to favage life, and measure the attainments of the human mind in that state by this standard, we shall find, according to an obfervation which I have already made, that the intellectual powers of man must be extremely limited in their operations. They are confined within the narrow sphere of what he deems ne: ceffary for supplying his own wants. Whatever has not some relation to these, neither attracts his attention, nor is the object of his inquiries. But, however narrow the bounds may be within which the knowledge of a favage is circumfcribed, he possesses thoroughly that small portion which he has attained. It was not communicated to him by formal instruction; he does not attend to it as a matter of mere speculation and curiosity; it is the refult of his own observation, the fruit of his own experience, and accommodated to his condi-tion and exigencies. While employed in the active occupations of war or of hunting, he often finds himfelf in difficult and perilous fituations, from which w. - : ini which the efforts of his own fagacity must extricate him. He is frequently engaged in measures, where every step depends upon his own ability to decide, where he must rely solely upon his own penetration to discern the dangers to which he is exposed, and upon his own wisdom in providing against them. In consequence of this, he feels the knowledge which he possesses, and either in deliberation or action rests on himself alone.

. As the talents of individuals are exercised and improved by fuch exertions, much political wisdom is said to be displayed in conducting the affairs of their small communities. The council of old men in an American tribe, deliberating upon its interests, and determining with respect to peace or war, has been compared to the fenate in more polished republics. proceedings of the former, we are told, are often no less formal and fagacious than those of the latter. Great political wisdom is exhibited in pondering the various measures proposed, and in balancing their probable advantages, against the evils of which they may be productive. Much address and eloquence are employed by the leaders, who aspire at acquiring such considence with their countrymen, as to have an afcendant in those assemblies h. But, among savage tribes, the field for displaying political talents cannot be extensive. Where the idea of private property is incomplete, and no criminal jurifdiction is established, there is hardly any function of internal government to exercise. Where there is no commerce, and scarcely any

h Charley. N. Fr. iii. 269, &c.

intercourse among separate tribes; where enmity is implacable, and hostilities are carried on almost without intermission; there will be few points of public concern to adjust with their neighbours; and that department of their affairs which may be denominated foreign, cannot be fo intricate as to require much refined policy in conducting it. Where individuals are fo thoughtless and improvident as seldom to take effectual precautions for felf-preservation, it is vain to expect that public measures and deliberations will be regulated by the contemplation of remote events. It is the genius of savages to act from the impulse of present passion. They have neither forelight nor temper to form complicated arrangements with respect to their future conduct. The consultations of the Americans, indeed, are so frequent, and their negotiations are fo many i, and fo long protracted, as to give their proceedings an extraordinary aspect of wisdom. But this is not owing so much to the depth of their schemes, as to the coldness and phlegm of their temper, which render them slow in determining k. If we except the celebrated league, that united the Five Nations in Canada into a federal republic, which shall be considered in its proper place, we can discern few such traces of political wisdom, among the rude American tribes, as discover any great degree of fore-fight or extent of intellectual abilities. Even among them, we shall find public measures more frequently directed by the impetuous ferocity of their youth, than regulated by the experience and wifdom of their old men.

See Note XCIII. k Charley, N. Fr. iii. 271.

As the condition of man in the favage state is unfavourable to the progress of the understand-ing, it has a tendency likewise, in some respects, to check the exercise of affection, and to render the heart contracted. The strongest feeling in the mind of a savage is a sense of his own inde-pendence. He has sacrificed so small a portion of his natural liberty by becoming a member of fociety, that he remains, in a great degree, the fole master of his own actions. He often takes his refolutions alone, without confulting, or feeling any connection with the persons around him. In many of his operations, he stands as much detached from the rest of his species, as if he had formed no union with them. Conscious how little he depends upon other men, he is apt to view them with a careless indifference. Even the force of his mind contributes to increase this unconcern, and as he looks not beyond himfelf in deliberating with respect to the part which he should act, his folicitude about the consequences of it feldom extends farther. He pur-fues his own career, and indulges his own fancy, without inquiring or regarding whether what he does be agreeable or offensive to others, whether they may derive benefit or receive hurt from it. Hence the ungovernable caprice of favages, their impatience under any species of restraint, their inability to suppress or moderate any inclination, the fcorn or neglect with which they receive advice, their high estimation of themselves, and their contempt of other men. Among them, the pride of independence produces almost the same effects with interestedness in a more advanced state of society; it refers every thing to a man himself, it leads him to be indifferent about the manner in which his actions may affect other men, and renders the gratistication of his own wishes the measure and end of conduct.

Fernandez, Mission. de los Chiquit. 33.

To the same cause may be imputed the hardness of heart, and insensibility, remarkable in all savage nations. Their minds, roused only by strong emotions, are little susceptible of gentle, delicate, or tender affections m. Their union is fo incomplete, that each individual acts as if he retained all his natural rights entire and undiminished. If a favour is conferred upon him, or any beneficial fervice is performed on his account, he receives it with much fatisfaction, because it contributes to his enjoyment; but this fentiment extends not beyond himself, it excites no sense of obligation, he neither feels gratitude nor thinks of making any return ". Even among persons the most closely connected, the exchange of those good offices which strengthen attachment, mollify the heart, and sweeten the intercourse of life, is not frequent. The high ideas of independence among the Americans nourish a fullen reserve, which keeps them at a distance from each other. The nearest relations are mutually afraid to make any demand, or to folicit any service, lest it should be considered by the other as imposing a burden or laying a restraint upon his will.

I have already remarked the influence of this hard unfeeling temper upon domestic life, with

m Charlev. N. Fr. iii. 309.

N. i. c. 2. See Note XCIV.

De la Potherie, iii. 28.

VOL. II.

respect

respect to the connection between husband and wife, as well as that between parents and children. Its effects are no less conspicuous, in the performance of those mutual offices of tenderness which the infirmities of our nature frequently exact. Among some tribes, when any of their number are seized with any violent disease, they are generally abandoned by all around them, who, careless of their recovery, fly in the utmost consternation from the supposed danger of infection p. But even where they are not thus deferted, the cold indifference with which they are attended can afford them little confolation. No look of fympathy, no foothing expressions, no officious services, contribute to alleviate the diffress of the fufferers, or to make them forget what they endure q. Their nearest relations will often refuse to submit to the smallest inconveniency, or to part with the least trifle, however much it may tend to their accommodation or relief. So little is the breast of a savage sufceptible of those fentiments which prompt men to that feeling attention which mitigates the calamities of human life, that, in some provinces of America, the Spaniards have found it necessary to inforce the common duties of humanity by positive laws, and to oblige husbands and wives, parents and children, under severe penalties, to take care of each other during their fickness.

Cogulludo, Hift. de Yucathan, p. 300:

P Lettre de P. Cataneo ap. Muratori Christian, i. 309. Tertre, ii. 410. Lozano, 100. Herrera, dec. 4. lib. viii. c. 5. dec. 5. lib. iv. c. 2. Faulkner's Descript. of Patagonia, 98. 9 Gumilla, i. 329. Lozano, 100.

Garcia, Origen, &c. 90. Herrera, dec. 4. lib. viii. c. 5.

The same harshness of temper is still more conspicuous in their treatment of the animal creation. Prior to their intercourse with the people of Europe, the North Americans had some tame dogs, which accompanied them in their hunting excursions, and ferved them with all the ardour and fidelity peculiar to the species. But, instead of that fond attachment which the hunter naturally feels towards those useful companions of his toils, they requite their fervices with neglect, feldom feed, and never carefs them t. In other provinces, the Americans have become acquainted with the domestic animals of Europe, and avail themselves of their service; but it is universally observed that they always treat them harshly is and never employ any method, either for breaking or managing them, but force and cruelty. In every part of the deportment of man in his favage state, whether towards his equals of the human species, or towards the animals below him. we recognize the same character, and trace the operations of a mind intent on its own gratifications, and regulated by its own caprice, with little attention or fensibility to the fentiments and feelings of the beings around him.

After explaining how unfavourable the favage flate is to the cultivation of the understanding, and to the improvement of the heart, I should not have thought it necessary to mention what may be deemed its lesser defects, if the character of nations, as well as of individuals, were not often more diffinctly marked by circumstances apparently trivial than by those of greater moment. A favage, frequently placed in fituations of danger and distress, depending on himself alone, and wrapt up in his own thoughts and schemes, is a serious melancholy animal. His attention to others is small. The range of his own ideas is narrow. Hence that taciturnity which is so disgusting to men accustomed to the open intercourse of social conversation. When they are not engaged in action, the Americans often fit whole days in one posture, without opening their lips x. When they go forth to war, or to the chase, they usually march in a line at some distance from one another, and with out exchanging a word. The fame profound filence is observed when they row together in a canoe y. It is only when they are animated by intoxicating liquors, or roused by the jollity of the festival and dance, that they become gay and conversible.

Charley. N. Fr. iii. 119. 337.

^{*} Ulloa, Notic. American. 312.

To the same causes may be imputed the refined cunning with which they form and execute their schemes. Men, who are not habituated to a liberal communication of their own fentiments and wishes, are apt to be so distrustful, as to place little confidence in others, and to have recourse to an infidious craft in accomplishing their own purposes. In civilized life, those persons, who, by their situation, have but a few objects of pursuit on which their minds incessantly dwell, are most remarkable for low artifice in carrying on their little projects. Among favages, whose views are equally confined, and their attention no less persevering, those circumstances must operate still more powerfully, and gradually ac-

Voyage de Bouguer, 102. Y Charlev, iii. 340.

cuftom

custom them to a disingenuous subtlety in all their transactions. The force of this is increased by habits which they acquire in carrying on the two most interesting operations wherein they are engaged. With them war is a system of craft, in which they trust for success to stratagem more than to open force, and have their invention continually on the stretch to circumvent and furprise their enemies. As hunters, it is their constant object to ensnare, in order that they may destroy. Accordingly, art and cunning have been univerfally observed as diftinguishing characteristics of all savages. The people of the rude tribes of America are remarkable for their artifice and duplicity. Impenetrably fecret in forming their measures, they pursue them with a patient undeviating attention, and there is no refinement of diffimulation which they cannot employ, in order to infure fuccess. The natives of Peru were engaged above thirty years, in concerting the plan of that infurrection which took place under the vice-royalty of the marquis de Villa-Garcia; and though it was communicated to a great number of persons in all different ranks, no indication of it ever transpired during that long period; no man betrayed his trust, or by an unguarded look, or rash word, gave rise to any suspicion of what was intended. The dissimulation and craft of individuals is no less remarkable than that of nations. When fet upon leceiving, they wrap themselves up so articially, that it is impossible to penetrate into their intentions, or to detect their designs.

z Voyage de Ulloa, ii. 309.

K 3

² Gumilla, i. 162. Charlev. iii. 109.

But if there be defects or vices peculiar to the favage state, there are likewise virtues which it inspires, and good qualities, to the exercise of which it is friendly. The bonds of society sit so loose upon the members of the more rude. American tribes, that they hardly feel any restraint. Hence the spirit of independence, which is the pride of a savage, and which he considers as the unalienable prerogative of man. Incapable of control, and distaining to acknowledge any superior, his mind, though limited in its powers, and erring in many of its pursuits, acquires such elevation by the conscious ness of its own freedom, that he acts on some occasions with associations force, and perseverance, and dignity.

4.

As independence nourishes this high spirit among favages, the perpetual wars in which they are engaged call it forth into action. Such long intervals of tranquillity as are frequent in polished societies are unknown in the savage state. Their enmities, as I have observed, are impla-cable and immortal. The valour of the young men is never allowed to rust in inaction. The hatchet is always in their hand, either for attack or defence. Even in their hunting excurfions, they must be on their guard against surprise from the hostile tribes, by which they are furrounded. Accustomed to continual alarms, they grow familiar with danger; courage becomes an habitual virtue, refulting naturally from their fituation, and strengthened by constant exertions. The mode of displaying fortitude may not be the same in small and rude communities, as in more powerful and civilized states. Their fystem of war, and standard of valour, may be formed upon different principles, but in no situation does the human mind rise more superior to the sense of danger, or the dread of death, than in its most simple and uncultivated state.

· Another virtue remarkable among favages, is attachment to the community of which they are members. From the nature of their political union, one might expect this tie to be exwhich render the influence, even of their loofe mode of affociation, very powerful. The American tribes are fmall; combined against their neighbours, in profecution of ancient enmities, or in avenging recent injuries, their interests and operations are neither numerous nor complex. These are objects which the uncultivated understanding of a favage can comprehend. His heart standing of a savage can comprehend. His heart is capable of forming connections, which are so little diffused. He affents with warmth to public measures, dictated by passions similar to those which direct his own conduct. Hence the ardour with which individuals undertake the most perilous fervice, when the community deems it necessary. Hence their fierce and deep-rooted antipathy to the public enemies. Hence their zeal for the honour of their tribe, and that love of their country, which prompts them to brave danger that it may triumph, and to endure the most exquisite torments, without a groan, that it may not be difgraced.

Thus, in every fituation where a human being can be placed, even the most unfavourable, there are virtues which peculiarly belong to it; there are affections which it calls forth; there is a species of happiness which it yields. Nature, with most beneficent intention, conciliates and forms the mind to its condition; the ideas and wishes of man extend not beyond that state of fociety to which he is habituated. What it presents as objects of contemplation or enjoyment fills and satisfies his mind, and he can hardly conceive any other mode of life to be pleafant, or even tolerable. The Tartar, accustomed to roam over extensive plains, and to subfift on the product of his herds, imprecates upon his enemy, as the greatest of all curses, that he may be condemned to refide in one place, and to be nourished with the top of a weed. The rude Americans, fond of their own pursuits, and fatisfied with their own lot, are equally unable to comprehend the intention or utility of the various accommodations which, in more polished society, are deemed effential to the comfort of life. Far from complaining of their own fituation, or viewing that of men in a more improved state with admiration or envy, they regard themselves as the standard of excellence, as beings the best entitled, as well as the most perfectly qualified, to enjoy real happiness. Unaccustomed to any restraint upon their will or their actions, they behold with amazement the inequality of rank and the subordination which take place in civilized life, and confider the vo-luntary submission of one man to another as a renunciation, no less base than unaccountable, of the first distinction of humanity. Void of forefight, as well as free from care themselves, and delighted with that state of indolent fecurity, they they wonder at the anxious precautions, the unceasing industry, and complicated arrangements of Europeans, in guarding against distant evils, or providing for future wants; and they often exclaim against their preposterous folly, in thus multiplying the troubles, and increasing the labour of life. This preference of their own manners is conspicuous on every occasion. Even the names, by which the various nations wish to be distinguished, are assumed from this idea of their own pre-eminence. The appellation: which the Iroquois give to themselves is, the chief of men . Caraibe, the original name of the fierce inhabitants of the Windward Islands, fignifies the warlike people d. The Cherokees, from an idea of their own superiority, call the Europeans Nothings, or the accurfed race, and affume: to themselves the name of the beloved people. The same principle regulated the notions of the other Americans concerning the Europeans; for although, at first, they were filled with astonishment at their arts, and with dread of their power, they foon came to abate their estimation: of men, whose maxims of life were so different from their own. Hence they called them the froth of the fea, men without father or mother. They supposed, that either they had no country of their own, and therefore invaded that which belonged to others f; or that, being destitute of the necessaries of life at Charley. N. Fr. iii 308. Lahontan, ii. 97.

Colden, i. 3. A Rochefort, Hift. des Antilles, 455.

e Adair, Hist of Amer. Indians, p. 32. f Benzon. Hist. Novi Orbis, lib. iii. c. 27.

WOOD PARTY

home, they were obliged to roam over the ocean, in order to rob fuch as were more amply provided.

Men, thus fatisfied with their condition, are far from any inclination to relinquish their own habits, or to adopt those of civilized life. The transition is too violent to be suddenly made. Even where endeavours have been used to wean a savage from his own customs, and to render the accommodations of polished society familiar to him; even where he has been allowed to take of those pleasures, and has been honoured with those distinctions, which are the chief objects of our desire, he droops and languishes under the restraint of laws and forms, he seizes the first opportunity of breaking loose from them, and returns with transport to the forest or the wild, where he can enjoy a careless and uncontrolled freedom.

Thus I have finished a laborious delineation of the character and manners of the uncivilized tribes scattered over the vast continent of America. In this, I aspire not at rivalling the great masters who have painted and adorned savage life, either in boldness of design, or in the glow and beauty of their colouring. I am satisfied with the more humble merit of having persisted with patient industry, in viewing my subject in many various lights, and collecting from the most accurate observers such detached, and often minute features, as might enable me to exhibit a portrait that resembles the original,

Before I close this part of my work, one obfervation more is necessary, in order to justify the conclusions which I have formed, or to prevent the mistakes into which such as examine them may fall. In contemplating the inhabitants of a country fo widely extended as America, great attention should be paid to the diversity of climates under which they are placed. The influence of this I have pointed out with respect to several important particulars, which have been the object of research; but even where it has not been mentioned, it ought not to be overlooked. The provinces of America are of fuch different temperament, that this alone is fufficient to constitute a distinction between their inhabitants. In every part of the earth where man exists, the power of climate operates, with decifive influence, upon his condition and character. In those countries which approach near to the extremes of heat or cold, this influence is so conspicuous as to strike every eye. Whether we consider man merely as an animal, or as being endowed with rational powers which fit him for activity and speculation, we shall find that he has uniformly attained the greatest perfection of which his nature is capable, in the temperate regions of the globe. There his constitution is most vigorous, his organs most acute, and his form most beautiful. There, too, he possesses a superior extent of capacity, greater fertility of imagination, more enterprising courage, and a sensibility of heart which gives birth to desires, not only ardent, but persevering. In this favourite situation he has displayed the utmost efforts of his genius, in literature, in policy, in commerce, in war, and in all the arts which improve or embellish life h.

This powerful operation of climate is felt most sensibly by rude nations, and produces greater effects than in societies more improved. The talents of civilized men are continually exerted in rendering their own condition more comfortable; and by their ingenuity and inventions, they can, in a great measure, supply the defects, and guard against the inconveniences of any climate. But the improvident savage is affected by every circumstance peculiar to his situation. He takes no precaution either to mitigate or to improve it. Like a plant or an animal, he is formed by the climate under which he is placed, and feels the full force of its influence.

In furveying the rude nations of America, this natural distinction between the inhabitants of the temperate and torrid zones is very remarkable. They may, accordingly, be divided into two great classes. The one comprehends all the North Americans, from the river St. Laurence to the Gulf of Mexico, together with the people of Chili, and a few small tribes towards the extremity of the southern continent. To the other belong all the inhabitants of the islands, and those settled in the various provinces which extend from the islands of Darien almost to the southern confines of Brasil, along the east side of the Andes. In the former, which compre-

henda

h Dr. Ferguson's Essay on the Hist. of Civil Society, part. iii. e. r.

hends all the regions of the temperate zone that in America are inhabited, the human species appears manifestly to be more perfect. The natives are more robust, more active, more intelligent, and more courageous. They posses, in the most eminent degree, that force of mind and love of independence which I have pointed out as the chief virtues of man in his favage state. They have defended their liberty with perfevering fortitude against the Europeans, who subdued the other rude nations of America with the greatest ease. The natives of the temperate zone are the only people in the New World who are indebted for their freedom to their own valour. The North Americans, though long encompassed by three formidable European powers, still retain part of their original possesfions, and continue to exist as independent nations. The people of Chili, though early invaded, still maintain a gallant contest with the Spaniards, and have set bounds to their encroachments; whereas, in the warmer regions, men are more feeble in their frame, less vigorous in the efforts of their mind, of a gentle but dastardly spirit, more enslaved by pleasure, and more funk in indolence. Accordingly, it is in the torrid zone that the Europeans have most completely established their dominion over America; the most fertile and defirable provinces in it are subjected to their yoke; and if several tribes there still enjoy independence, it is either because they have never been attacked by an enemy already satiated with conquest, and posfessed of larger territories than he was able to occupy, or because they have been saved from TOL. IL. oppression oppression by their remote and inaccessible fituation.

Conspicuous as this distinction may appear between the inhabitants of those different regions, it is not, however, univerfal. Moral and political causes, as I have formerly observed, affect the disposition and character of individuals as well as nations, still more powerfully than the influence of climate. There are, accordingly, fome tribes, in various parts of the torrid zone, poffessed of courage, high spirit, and the love of independence, in a degree hardly inferior to the natives of more temperate climates. We are too little acquainted with the history of those people, to be able to trace the feveral circumstances in their progress and condition, to which they are indebted for this remarkable pre-eminence. The fact, nevertheless, is certain. As early as the first voyage of Columbus, he received information that several of the islands were inhabited by the Caribbees, a fierce race of men, nowife refembling their feeble and timid neighbours. In his fecond expedition to the New World, he found this information to be just, and was himself a witness of their intrepid valour i. The same character they have maintained invariably in all fubfequent contests with the people of Europe k; and, even in our own times, we have feen them make a gallant stand in defence of the last territory which the rapacity of their invaders had left in their possession. Some nations in Brasil were no less eminent for vigour of mind, and k Rochefort, Hist. des Antilles, 531.

F1/8 40 1 150

Life of Columbus, c. 47, 48. See NOTE XCV.

See NOTE XCVI.

bravery in war m. The people of the isthmus of Darien boldly met the Spaniards in the field, and frequently repelled those formidable invaders n. Other instances might be produced. It is not attending to any fingle cause or principle, how powerful and extensive soever its influence may appear, that we can explain the actions, or account for the character of men. Even the law of climate, more universal, perhaps, in its operation than any that affects the human species, cannot be applied, in judging of their conduct, without many exceptions. in graning his me as former than

BOOK V.

Commediatemen แต่สุด เมื่องเกาะเก

1518.] WHEN Grijalva returned to Cuba, he found the armament destined to attempt the conquest of that rich country which he had discovered, almost complete. Not only ambition, but avarice, had urged Velasquez to hasten his preparations; and having such a pro-spect of gratifying both, he had advanced con-siderable sums out of his private fortune towards defraying the expence of the expedition. At the same time, he exerted his influence as governor, in engaging the most distinguished persons in the colony to undertake the service. At a time when the spirit of the Spanish nation was

WATER ATT

m Lery ap. de Bry, iii. 207, &c.

[&]quot; Herrera, dec. 1. lib. x. c. 15, &c.; dec. 2. passim.

See NOTE XCVII.

adventurous to excess, a number of soldiers. eager to embark in any daring enterprise, foon appeared. But it was not so easy to find a per-fon qualified to take the command in an expedition of so much importance; and the character of Velasquez, who had the right of nomination, greatly increased the difficulty of the choice. Though of most aspiring ambition, and not destitute of talents for government, he possessed neither such courage, nor such vigour and activities of mind as a support the courage. vity of mind, as to undertake in person the conduct of the armament which he was preparing. In this embarrassing situation, he formed the chimerical scheme, not only of atchieving great exploits by a deputy, but of securing to himself the glory of conquests which were to be made by another. In the execution of this plan, he fondly aimed at reconciling contradictions. He was folicitous to choose a commander of intrepid resolution, and of superior abilities, because he knew these to be requisite in order to ensure success; but, at the same time, from the jealousy natural to little minds, he wished this person to be of a spirit so tame and obsequious, as to be entirely dependent on his will. But when he came to apply those ideas in forming an opinion concerning the several officers who occurred to his thoughts as worthy of being entrusted with the command, he soon perceived that it was impossible to find such incompatible qualities united in one character. Such as were distinguished for courage and talents were too high-spirited to be passive instruments in his hand. Those who appeared more gentle and tractable, were destitute of capacity, and unequal to the charge. This augmented + 1 1 D 12 augmented his perplexity and his fears. He deliberated long, and with much folicitude, and was still wavering in his choice, when Amador de Lares, the royal treasurer in Cuba, and Andres Duero, his own fecretary, the two persons in whom he chiefly confided, were encouraged by this irrefolution to propose a new candidate, and they supported their recommendation with fuch affiduity and address, that, no less fatally for Velasquez than happily for their country, it proved fuccessful b.

The man whom they pointed out to him was Fernando Cortes. He was born at Medellin, a fmall town in Estremadura, in the year one thousand four hundred and eighty-five, and descended from a family of noble blood, but of very moderate fortune. Being originally destined by his parents to the study of law, as the most likely method of bettering his condition, he was fent early to the university of Salamanca, where he imbibed some tincture of learning. But he was foon difgusted with an academic life, which did not fuit his ardent and reftless genius, and retired to Medellin, where he gave himself up entirely to active sports and martial exercises. At this period of life, he was so impetuous, so overbearing, and so dissipated, that his father was glad to comply with his inclination, and fend him abroad as an adventurer in arms. There were in that age two conspicuous theatres, on which such of the Spanish youth as courted military glory might display their valour; one in Italy, under the command of the Great Captain; the other in the New World. Cortes preferred the former, but was prevented by in-disposition from embarking with a reinforcementof troops sent to Naples. Upon this disappointment he turned his views towards America, whither he was allured by the prospect of the advantages which he might derive from the patronage of Ovando, the governor of Hispaniola, who was his kinsman. When he landed at St. Domingo in one thousand five hundred and four, his reception was fuch as equalled his most fanguine hopes, and he was employed by the governor in feveral honourable and lucrative stations. These however did not satisfy his ambition; and in the year one thousand five hundred and eleven, he obtained permission to accompany Diego Velasquez in his expedition to Cuba. In this fervice he distinguished himself fo much, that, notwithstanding some violent contests with Velasquez, occasioned by trivial events, unworthy of remembrance, he was at length taken into favour, and received an ample concession of lands and of Indians, the recompence usually bestowed upon adventurers in the New World d.

b B. Diaz. c. 19. Gomara, Cron. c. 7. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. iii, c. 11.

Though Cortes had not hitherto acted in high command, he had displayed such qualities in several scenes of difficulty and danger, as raised universal expectation, and turned the eyes of his countrymen towards him, as one capable of performing great things. The turbulence of youth, as soon as he found objects and occupations suited to the ardour of his mind, gradually subfided, and settled into a habit of regular indefatigable activity. The impetuofity of his temper, when he came to act with his equals, infenfibly abated, by being kept under restraint, and mellowed into a cordial foldierly frankness. These qualities were accompanied with calm prudence in concerting his schemes, with perfevering vigour in executing them, and with what is peculiar to superior genius, the art of gaining the confidence and governing the minds of men. To all which were added the inferior accomplishments that strike the vulgar, and command their respect; a graceful person, a winning aspect, extraordinary address in martial exercises, and a constitution of such vigour as to be capable of enduring any fatigue.

See Note XCVIII. d Gomara, Cron. c. 1, 2, 3. fatigable

As foon as Cortes was mentioned to Velasquez by his two confidents, he flattered himself that, he had at length found what he had hitherto fought in vain, a man with talents for command, but not an object for jealoufy. Neither the rank nor the fortune of Cortes, as he imagined, were fuch that he could afpire at independence. He had reason to believe that by his own readiness to bury ancient animosities in oblivion, as well as his liberality in conferring feveral recent favours, he had already gained the good-will of Cortes, and hoped, by this new and unexpected mark of confidence, that he might attach him for ever to his interest. Cortes, receiving his commission [Oct. 23] with the warmest expressions of respect and gratitude to the governor, immediately erected his standard before his own house, appeared in a military drefs, and affumed all the enfighs of his new dignity. His utmost influence and activity 1. 1. . . / were were exerted in perfuading many of his friends to engage in the service, and in urging forward the preparations for the voyage. All his own funds, together with what money he could raise by mortgaging his lands and Indians, were expended in purchasing military stores and provisions, or in supplying the wants of such of his officers as were unable to equip themselves in a manner suited to their rank. Inossensive, and even laudable as this conduct was, his disappointed competitors were malicious enough to give it a turn to his difadvantage. They represented him as aiming already, with little difguise, at establishing an independent authority over his troops, and endeavouring to fecure their respect or love by his oftentatious and interested liberality. They reminded Velasquez of his former dissen-sions with the man in whom he now reposed so much confidence, and foretold that Cortes would. be more apt to avail himself of the power, which the governor was inconfiderately putting in his hands, to avenge past injuries, than to requite recent obligations. These infinuations made such impression upon the suspicious mind of Velasquez, that Cortes soon observed some symptoms of a growing alienation and distrust in his behaviour, and was advised by Lares and Duero, to hasten his departure, before these should become fo confirmed, as to break out with open violence. Fully fensible of this danger, he urged forward his preparations with such rapidity, that he set sail from St. Jago de Cuba on the eighteenth of November, Velasquez accompanying him to the shore, and taking leave of him with an appearance of perfect friendship and considence, though he had secretly given it in charge to some of Cortes's officers, to keep a watchful eye upon every part of their commander's conduct s.

Cortes proceeded to Trinidad, a small settlement on the same side of the island, where he was joined by feveral adventurers, and received a fupply of provisions and military stores, of which his flock was fill very incomplete. He had hardly left St. Jago, when the jealoufy which had been working in the breaft of Velafquez, grew so violent, that it was impossible to suppress it. The armament was no longer under his own eye and direction; and he felt, that as his power over it ceased, that of Cortes would become more absolute. Imagination now aggravated every circumstance which had formerly excited suspicion: the rivals of Cortes industrioully threw in reflections which increased his fears; and with no less art than malice they called superstition to their aid, employing the predictions of an astrologer in order to complete the alarm. All these, by their united operation, produced the defired effect. Velasquez repented bitterly of his own imprudence, in having committed a trust of so much importance to a perfon whose sidelity appeared fo doubtful, and hastily dispatched instructions to Trinidad, empowering Verdugo, the chief magistrate there, to deprive Cortes of his commission. But Cortes had already made fuch progress in gaining the esteem and confidence of his troops, that, finding officers as well as foldiers equally zealous to support his authority, he soothed or intimidated Verdugo, and was permitted to depart from Trinidad without moleftation.

fupport

Gomara, Cron. c. 7. B. Diaz. c. 20.

JUM II

. From Trinidad Cortes sailed for the Havana, in order to raife more foldiers, and to complete the victualling of his fleet. There feveral persons of distinction entered into the service, and engaged to supply what provisions were still wanting; but as it was necessary to allow them some time for performing what they had promifed, Velafquez, fensible that he ought no longer to rely on a man of whom he had fo openly difcovered his distrust, availed himself of the interval, which this unavoidable delay afforded, in order to make one attempt more to wrest the command out of the hands of Cortes. He loudly complained of Verdugo's conduct, accufing him either of childish facility, or of manifest treachery, in fuffering Cortes to escape from Trinidad. Anxious to guard against a second disappointment, he sent a person of confidence to the Havana, with peremptory injunctions to Pedro Barba, his lieutenant-governor in that colony, instantly to arrest Cortes, to send him prisoner to St. Jago under a strong guard, and to countermand the sailing of the armament until he should receive farther orders. He wrote likewise to the principal officers, requiring them to affist Barba in executing what he had given him in charge. But before the arrival of his messenger, a Franciscan friar of St. Jago had fecretly conveyed an account of this interesting transaction to Bartholomew de Olmedo, a monk of the same order, who acted as chaplain to the expedition, Cortes,

1518.7

Cortes, forewarned of the danger, had time to take precautions for his own fafety. His first step was to find some pretext for removing from the Havana Diego de Ordaz, an officer of great merit, but in whom, on account of his known attachment to Velasquez, he could not confide in this trying and delicate juncture. He gave him the command of a vessel, destined to take on board some provisions in a small harbour beyond Cape Antonio, and thus made fure of his absence, without seeming to suspect his side-lity. When he was gone, Cortes no longer concealed the intentions of Velasquez from his troops; and as officers and foldiers were equally impatient to fet out on an expedition, in preparing for which most of them had expended all their fortunes, they expressed their astonishment and indignation at that illiberal jealoufy to which the governor was about to facrifice, not only the honour of their general, but all their fanguine hopes of glory and wealth. With one voice they intreated that he would not abandon the important station to which he had such a good title. They conjured him not to deprive them of a leader whom they followed with fuch well-founded confidence, and offered to shed the last drop of their blood in maintaining his authority. Cortes was eafily induced to comply with what he himself so ardently defired. He fwore that he would never defert foldiers who had given him fuch a fignal proof of their attachment, and promifed instantly to conduct them to that rich country, which had been fo long the object of their thoughts and wishes. This declaration was received with transports of military applause, accompanied with threats and imprecations against all who should presume to call in question the jurisdiction of their general, or to obstruct the execution of his designs.

3 / 60

Every thing was now ready for their departure; but though this expedition was fitted out by the united effort of the Spanish power in Cuba; though every fettlement had contributed its quota of men and provisions; though the governor had laid out confiderable fums, and each adventurer had exhausted his stock, or frained his credit, the poverty of the prepara-tions was fuch as must astonish the present age, and bore, indeed, no refemblance to an armament destined for the conquest of a great empire. The fleet consisted of eleven vessels; the largest of a hundred tons, which was dignified by the name of Admiral; three of seventy or eighty tons, and the rest small open barks. On board of these were fix hundred and seventeen men; of which five hundred and eight belonged to the land fervice, and a hundred and nine were feamen or artificers. The foldiers were divided into eleven companies, according to the number of the ships; to each of which Cortes appointed a captain, and committed to him the command of the yessel while at sea, and of the men when on shore s. As the use of sire-arms among the nations of Europe was hitherto consined to a few battalions of regularly disciplined infantry, only thirteen soldiers were armed with muskets, thirty-two were crofs-bow men, and the rest had swords and spears. Instead of the usual defensive armour, which must have been cumbersome in a hot climate, the soldiers wore jackets quilted with cotton, which experience had taught the Spaniards to be a fufficient protection against the weapons of the Americans. They had only sixteen horses, ten small fieldpieces, and four falconets h.

With this slender and ill-provided train did Cortes set sail [Feb. 10, 1519], to make war upon a monarch whose dominions were more extensive than all the kingdoms subject to the Spanish crown. As religious enthusiasm always mingled with the spirit of adventure in the New World, and, by a combination still more strange, united with avarice, in prompting the Spaniards to all their enterprises, a large cross was dis-played in their standards, with this inscription, Let us follow the cross, for under this sign we shall conquer.

So powerfully were Cortes and his followers animated with both these passions, that no less eager to plunder the opulent country whither they were bound, than zealous to propagate the Christian faith among its inhabitants, they set out, not with the solicitude natural to men going upon dangerous fervices, but with that confidence which arises from security of success, and certainty of the divine protection.

As Cortes had determined to touch at every place which Grijalva had visited, he steered directly towards the island of Cozumel: there he had the good fortune to redeem Jerome de Agui-lar, a Spaniard, who had been eight years a pri-foner among the Indians. This man was per-fectly acquainted with a dialect of their language, understood through a large extent of country, and possessing besides a considerable share of prudence and sagacity, proved extremely useful as an interpreter. From Cozumel, Cortes proceeded to the river of Tabasco [March 4], in hopes of a reception as friendly as Grijalva had met with there, and of finding gold in the same abundance; but the disposition of the natives, from some unknown cause, was totally changed. After repeated endeavours to conciliate their good-will, he was conftrained to have recourfe to violence. Though the forces of the enemy were numerous, and advanced with extraordinary courage, they were routed, with great saughter, in feveral fuccessive actions. The loss which they fustained, and still more the astonishment and terror excited by the destructive effect of the fire-arms, and the dreadful appearance of the horses, humbled their fierce spirits, and induced them to fue for peace. They acknowledged the king of Castile as their fovereign, and granted Cortes a supply of provisions, with a present of cotton garments, some gold, and twenty female flaves i.

h B. Diaz. c. 19

Cortes continued his course to the westward, keeping as near the shore as possible, in order to observe the country; but could discover no proper place for landing, until he arrived at St. Juan de Ulua k. As he entered this harbour [April 2] a large canoe, full of people, among whom were two who seemed to be persons of distinction, approached his ship with signs of peace and i See Note CI.

k B. Diaz. c.31-36. Gomara, Cron. c. 18-23. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. iv. c. 11, &c.

0 1/2

amity. They came on board without fear or distrust, and addressed him in a most respectful manner, but in a language altogether unknown to Aguilar. Cortes was in the utmost perplexity and diffress, at an event of which he instantly foresaw all the consequences, and already felt the hesitation and uncertainty with which he should carry on the great schemes which he meditated, if, in his transactions with the natives, he must depend entirely upon such an imperfect, ambiguous, and conjectural mode of communication, as the use of figns. But he did not remain long in his embarraffing fituation: a fortunate accident extricated him, when his own fagacity could have contributed little towards his relief. One of the female flaves, whom he had received from the cazique of Tabasco, happened to be present at the first interview between Cortes and his new guests. She perceived his diffress, as well as the confusion of Aguilar; and as the perfectly understood the Mexican language, she explained what they had said in the Yucatan tongue, with which Auguilar was acquainted. This woman, known afterwards by the name of Donna Marina, and who makes a conspicuous figure in the history of the New World, where great revolutions were brought about by small causes and inconsiderable instruments, was born; in one of the provinces of the Mexican empire. Having been fold as a flave in the early part of her life, after a variety of adventurers she fell-into the hands of the Tabascans, and had resided long enough among them to acquire their language, without losing the use of her own. M 2 ... Thought Though it was both tedious and troublesome to converse by the intervention of two different interpreters, Cortes was so highly pleased with having discovered this method of carrying on some intercourse with the people of a country into which he was determined to penetrate, that in the transports of his joy he considered it as a visible interposition of Providence in his favour.

He now learned, that the two persons whom he had received on board of his ship were deputies from Teutile and Pilpatoe, two officers entrufted with the government of that province, by a great monarch, whom they called Montezuma; and that they were fent to inquire what his intentions were in visiting their coast, and to offer him what affiftance he might need, in order to continue his voyage. Cortes, flruck with the appearance of those people, as well as the tenor of the message, assured them, in respectful terms, that he approached their country with most friendly fentiments, and came to propose matters of great importance to the welfare of their prince and his kingdom, which he would unfold more fully, in person, to the governor and the general. Next morning, without waiting for any answer, he landed his troops, his horses, and artillery; and having chosen proper ground, began to erect huts for his men, and to fortify his camp. The natives, instead of opposing the entrance of those fatal guests into their country, assisted them in all their operations, with an alacrity of which they had ere long good reason to repent.

Next

¹ B. Diaz. c. 37, 38, 39. Gomara, Cron. c. 25, 26. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. v. c. 4.

Next day Teutile and Pilpatoe entered the Spanish camp with a numerous retinue, and Cortes considering them as the ministers of a great monarch, entitled to a degree of attention very different from that which the Spaniards were accustomed to pay to the petty caziques, with whom they had intercourse in the isles, received them with much formal ceremony. He informed. them, that he came as ambaffador from Don Carlos of Austria, king of Castile, the greatest monarch of the East, and was intrusted with propositions of such moment that he could impart them to none but the emperor Montezuma himself, and therefore required them to conduct him, without loss of time, into the presence of their master. The Mexican officers could not conceal their uneafiness at a request which they knew would be difagreeable, and which they forefaw might prove extremely embarrassing to their fovereign, whose mind had been filled with many disquieting apprehensions, ever since the former appearance of the Spaniards on his coasts. But before they attempted to disfuade Cortes from infifting on this demand, they en-deavoured to conciliate his good-will, by in-treating him to accept of certain prefents, which, as humble flaves of Montezuma, they laid at his feet. They were introduced with great parade, and confifted of fine cotton cloth, of plumes of various colours, and of ornaments' of gold and filver, to a confiderable value; the workmanship of which appeared to be as curious as the materials were rich. The display of these produced an effect very different from what the Mexicans intended. Instead of satisfying, it increased M 3 .

increased the avidity of the Spaniards, and ren-dered them so eager and impatient to become masters of a country which abounded with such precious productions, that Cortes could hardly listen with patience to the arguments which Pilpatoe and Teutile employed to disfuade him from visiting the capital, and in a haughty de-termined tone he insisted on his demand, of being admitted to a personal audience of their sovereign. During this interview, some painters, in the train of the Mexican chiefs, had been diligently employed in delineating, upon white cotton cloths, figures of the ships, the horses, the artillery, the foldiers, and whatever else attracted their eyes, as fingular. When Cortes observed this, and was informed that thefe pictures were to be fent to Montezuma, in order to convey to him a more lively idea of the strange and won-derful objects now presented to their view, than any words could communicate, he resolved to render the representation still more animated and interesting, by exhibiting such a spectacle as might give both them and their monarch an awful impression of the extraordinary prowess of his followers, and the irrefiftible force of their arms. The trumpets, by his order, founded an alarm; the troops, in a moment, formed in order of battle, the infantry performed fuch martial exercises as were best fuited to display the effect of their different weapons; the horse, in various evolutions, gave a specimen of their agility and strength; the artillery, pointed towards the thick woods which furrounded the camp, were fired, and made dreadful havoc among the trees. The Mexicans looked on with that filent amazement which is natural when the mind is struck with objects, which are both awful and above its comprehension. But, at the explosion of the cannon, many of them fled, some fell to the ground, and all were fo much confounded at the fight of men whose power for nearly refembled that of the gods, that Cortes found it difficult to compose and re-assure them. The painters had now many new objects on which to exercise their art, and they put their fancy on the stretch in order to invent figures and fymbols to represent the extraordinary things which they had feen.

Messengers were immediately dispatched to Montezuma with those pictures, and a full account of every thing that had passed since the arrival of the Spaniards, and by them Cortes fent a present of some European curiosities to Montezuma, which, though of no great value, he believed would be acceptable on account of their novelty. The Mexican monarchs, in order to obtain early information of every occurrence in all the corners of their extensive empire, had introduced a refinement in police, unknown, at that time in Europe. They had couriers posted at proper stations along the principal roads; and as these were trained to agility by a regular education, and relieved one another at moderate distances, they conveyed intelligence with furprifing rapidity. Though the capital in which Montezuma refided was above a hundred and eighty miles from St. Juan de Ulua, Cortes's presents were carried thither, and an answer to his demands was received in few days. The fame officers who had hitherto treated with the Spaniards,

Spaniards, were employed to deliver this answer; but as they knew how repugnant the determintion of their mafter was to all the schemes and wishes of the Spanish commander, they would not venture to make it known until they had previously endeavoured to footh and mollify him. For this purpose, they renewed their negotiation, by introducing a train of a hundred Indians, loaded with presents sent to him by Montezuma. The magnificence of these was such as became a great monarch, and far exceeded any idea which the Spaniards had hitherto formed of his wealth. They were placed on mats spread on the ground, in fuch order, as shewed them to the greatest advantage. Cortes and his officers viewed, with admiration, the various manufactures of the country, cotton stuffs fo fine, and of fuch delicate texture, as to refemble filk; pictures of animals, trees, and other natural objects, formed with feathers of different colours, disposed and mingled with fuch skill and elegance, as to rival the works of the pencil in truth and beauty of imitation. But what chiefly attracted their eyes, were two large plates of a circular form, one of massive gold representing the sun, the other of filver, an emblem of the moon m. These were accompanied with bracelets, collars, rings; and other trinkets of gold; and that nothing might be wanting which could give the Spaniards a complete idea of what the country afforded, with some boxes filled with pearls, precious stones, and grains of gold unwrought, as they had been found in the mines or rivers. Cortes received all these with an appearance of profound veneration for the monarch by whom they were bestowed. But when the Mexicans, presuming upon this, informed him, that their master, though he defired him to accept of what he had fent as a token of regard for that monarch whom Cortes represented, would not give his consent that foreign troops should approach nearer to his capital, or even allow them to continue longer in his dominions, the Spanish general declared, in a manner more resolute and peremptory than formerly, that he must insist on his first demand, as he could not, without dishonour, return to his own country, until he was admitted into the presence of the prince whom he was appointed to visit in the name of his fovereign. The Mexicans, aftonished at feeing any man dare to oppose that will, which they were accustomed to consider as supreme and irrefiftible, yet afraid of precipitating their country into an open rupture with fuch for-midable enemies, prevailed with Cortes to promise, that he would not move from his present camp, until the return of a messenger, whom they fent to Montezuma for farther instructions n. AUGUSTONIA SALL

The firmness with which Cortes adhered to his original proposal, should naturally have brought the negotiation between him and Montezuma to a speedy issue, as it seemed to leave the Mexican monarch no choice, but either to receive him with considence as a friend, or to oppose him openly as an enemy. The latter was what might have been expected from a haughty prince in possession of extensive power. The Mexican empire, at this period, was at a pitch of grandeur to which no fociety ever attained in fo short a period. Though it had subfisted, according to their own traditions, only a hundred and thirty years, its dominion extended from the North to the South Sea, over territories ftretch. ing, with some small interruption, above five hundred leagues from east to west, and more than two hundred from north to fouth, comprehending provinces not inferior in fertility, population, and opulence, to any in the torrid zone. The people were warlike and enterprising: the authority of the monarch unbounded, and his revenues confiderable. If, with the forces which might have been fuddenly affembled in fuch an empire, Montezuma had fallen upon the Spaniards while encamped on a barren unhealthy. coast, unsupported by any ally, without a place of retreat, and destitute of provisions, it seems to be impossible, even with all the advantages of their fuperior discipline and arms, that they could have stood the shock, and they must either have perished in such an unequal contest, or have abandoned the enterprise.

n B. Diaz. c. 39. Gomara, Cron. c. 27. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. v. c. 5, 6.

As the power of Montezuma enabled him to take this spirited part, his own dispositions were fuch as feemed naturally to prompt him to it. Of all the princes who had fwayed the Mexican sceptre, he was the most haughty, the most violent, and the most impatient of control. His subjects looked up to him with awe, and his enemies with terror. The former he governed, with unexampled rigour, but they were impressed with such an opinion of his capacity, as commanded their respect; and, by many victories over the latter, he had spread far the dread of his arms, and had added several considerable provinces to his dominions. But though his talents might be suited to the transactions of a state so imperfectly polished as the Mexican empire, and sufficient to conduct them while in their accustomed course, they were altogether inadequate to a conjuncture so extraordinary, and did not qualify him either to judge with the discernment, or to act with the decision, requisite in such trying emergence.

ring emergence.
From the moment that the Spaniards appeared From the moment that the Spaniards appeared on his coast, he discovered symptoms of timidity and embarrassment. Instead of taking such resolutions as the consciousness of his own power, or the memory of his former exploits, might have inspired, he deliberated with an anxiety and hesitation which did not escape the notice of his meanest courtiers. The perplexity and discomposure of Montezuma's mind upon this occasion, as well as the general dismay of his subjects, were not owing wholly to the impression which the Spaniards had made by the novelty of their appearance and the terror of their arms. Its origin may be traced up to a more remote source. There was an opinion, if we may be fource. There was an opinion, if we may be-lieve the earliest and most authentic Spanish historians, almost universal among the Ameri-cans, that some dreadful calamity was impending over their heads, from a race of formidable invaders who should come from regions towards the rising sun, to overrun and desolate their country. Whether this disquieting apprehension flowed from the memory of fome natural callamity lamity which had afflicted that part of the globe, and impressed the minds of the inhabitants with superstitious fears and forebodings, or whether it was an imagination accidentally suggested by the assonishment which the first sight of a new race of men occasioned, it is impossible to determine. But as the Mexicans were more prone to superstition than any people in the New World, they were more deeply affected by the appearance of the Spaniards, whom their credulity instantly represented as the instrument destined to bring about this fatal revolution which they dreaded. Under those circumstances, it ceases to be incredible that a handful of adventurers should alarm the monarch of a great empire, and all his subjects °.

2/1179

Notwithstanding the influence of this impression, when the messenger arrived from the Spanish camp with an account that the leader of the strangers, adhering to his original demand, refused to obey the order enjoining him to leave the country, Montezuma assumed some degree of resolution, and, in a transport of rage natural to a sierce prince unaccustomed to meet with any opposition to his will, he threatened to facrifice those presumptuous men to his gods. But his doubts and fears quickly returned, and instead of issuing orders to carry his threats into execution, he again called his ministers to confer and offer their advice. Feeble and temporising measures will always be the result when men assemble to deliberate in a situation where they ought to act. The Mexican counfellors took no effectual measure for expelling such troublefome intruders, and were satisfied with issuing a more positive injunction, requiring them to leave the country; but this they preposterously accompanied with a present of such value, as proved fresh inducement to remain there.

ought

O Cortes, Relatione Seconda, ap. Ramus. iii. 234, 235. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. iii. c. 1. lib. v. c. 11. lib. vii. c. 6. Gomara, Cron. c. 66. 92. 144.

Meanwhile, the Spaniards were not without folicitude or a variety of fentiments, in deliberating concerning their own future conduct. From what they had already feen, many of them formed fuch extravagant ideas concerning the opulence of the country, that despising danger or hardships, when they had in view treafures which appeared to be inexhaustible, they were eager to attempt the conquest. Others, estimating the power of the Mexican empire by its wealth, and enumerating the various proofs which had occurred of its being under a wellregulated administration, contended, that it would be an act of the wildest frenzy to attack such a state with a small body of men, in want of provisions, unconnected with any ally, and already enfeebled by the difeafes peculiar to the climate, and the loss of several of their number P. Cortes fecretly applauded the advocates for bold meafures, and cherished their romantic hopes, as such ideas corresponded with his own, and favoured the execution of the schemes which he had formed. From the time that the fuspicions of Velasquez broke out with open violence in the attempts to deprive him of the command, Cortes faw the necessity of disfolving a connection which would obstruct and embarrass all his operations, and watched for a proper opportunity of coming to a final rupture with him. Having this in view, he had laboured by every art to secure the esteem and affection of his soldiers. With his abilities for command, it was eafy to gain their esteem; and his followers were quickly fatisfied that they might rely, with perfect confidence, on the conduct and courage of their leader. Nor was it more difficult to acquire their affection. Among adventurers, nearly of the same rank, and serving at their own expence, the dignity of command did not elevate a general above mingling with those who acted under him. Cortes availed himself of this freedom of intercourse, to infinuate himself into their favour, and by his affable manners, by welltimed acts of liberality to some, by inspiring all with vast hopes, and by allowing them to trade privately with the natives 9, he attached the greater part of his foldiers fo firmly to himfelf, that they almost forgot that the armament had been fitted out by the authority, and at the expence, of another.

P B. Diaz. c. 40.

During those intrigues, Teutile arrived with the present from Montezuma, and, togther with it, delivered the ultimate order of that monarch to depart instantly out of his dominions; and when Cortes, instead of complying, renewed his request of an audience, the Mexican turned from him abruptly, and quitted the camp with looks and gestures which strongly expressed his surprise and resentment. Next morning, none of the natives, who used to frequent the camp in great numbers, in order to barter with the soldiers; and to bring in provisions, appeared. All friendly correspondence seemed now to be at an end, and it was expected every moment that hostilities would commence. This, though an event that might have been foreseen, occasioned a sudden consternation among the Spaniards, which emboldened the adherents of Velasquez not only to murmur and cabal against their general, but to appoint one of their number to remonstrate openly against his imprudence in attempting the conquest of a mighty empire with such inadequate force, and to urge the necessity of returning to Cuba, in order to refit the fleet and augment the army. Diego de Ordaz, one of his principal officers, whom the malecontents charged with this commission, delivered it with a soldierly freedom and bluntness, affuring Cortes that he spoke the fentiments of the whole army. He listened to this remonstrance without any appearance of emotion, and as he well knew the temper and wishes of his foldiers, and foresaw how they would receive a proposition fatal at once to all the splendid hopes and schemes which they had been forming with fuch complacency, he carried his diffimulation fo far as to feem to relinquish his own measures in compliance with the request of Ordaz, and iffued orders that the army should be in readiness next day to reimbark for Cuba. As foon as this was known, the disappointed adventurers exclaimed and threatened; the emissaries of Cortes, mingling with them, inflamed their rage; the ferment became general; the whole camp was almost in open mutiny; all demanding with eagerness to see their commander. Cortes was not flow in appearing; when, with one voice, officers and foldiers expressed their astonishment and indignation at the orders which they had received. It was unworthy, they cried, of the Castilian courage, to be daunted at the first aspect of danger, and infamous to fly before any enemy appeared. For their parts, they were determined not to relinquish an enterprise, that had hitherto been fuccessful, and which tended so visibly to spread the knowledge of true religion, and to advance the glory and interest of their country. Happy under his command, they would follow him with alacrity through every danger, in quest of those settlements and treafures which he had fo long held out to their view; but if he chose rather to return to Cuba, and tamely give up all his hopes of distinction and opulence to an envious rival, they would instantly choose another general to conduct them in that path of glory, which he had not fpirit to enter. Mar and there

Cortes, delighted with their ardour, took no offence at the boldness with which it was uttered. The sentiments were what he himself had inspired, and the warmth of expression satisfied him that his followers had imbibed them thoroughly. He affected however, to be surprised at what he heard, declaring that his orders to prepare for embarking were issued from a perfuasion that this was agreeable to his troops; that, from deference to what he had been informed was their inclination, he had facrificed his own private opinion, which was sirmly bent on establishing immediately a settlement on the sea-coast, and then on endeavouring to penetrate into the interior part of the country; that now he was convinced of his error; and as he perceived that they were animated with the generous spirit which breathed in every true Spaniard, he would refume, with fresh ardour, his original plan of operation, and doubted not to conduct them, in the career of victory, to fuch independent fortunes as their valour merited. Upon this declaration, shouts of applause testified the excess of their joy. The measure seemed to be taken with unanimous consent; such as secretly condemned it being obliged to join in the acclamations, partly to conceal their difaffection from their general, and partly to avoid the imputation of cowardice from their fellow-foldiers r.

Without allowing his men time to cool or to reflect, Cortes set about carrying his design into execution. In order to give a beginning to a colony, he affembled the principal persons in his army, and by their suffrage elected a council and magistrates in whom the government was to be vested. As men naturally transplant the inflitutions and forms of the mother-country into their new fettlements, this was framed upon the model of a Spanish corporation. The magistrates were distinguished by the same names and enfigns of office, and were to exercise a similar jurisdiction. All the persons chosen were most firmly devoted to Cortes, and the instrument of their election was framed in the king's name, without any mention of their dependence on Velasquez. The two principles of avarice and enthusiam, which prompted the Spaniards to all their enterprises in the New World, seem to

B. Diaz. c. 40, 41, 42. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. v. c. 6, 7. N 3 have have concurred in suggesting the name which Cortes bestowed on his infant settlement. He called it, The rich town of the true Cross s.

The first meeting of the new council was distinguished by a transaction of great moment. As soon as it assembled, Cortes applied for leave to enter; and approaching with many marks of profound respect, which added dignity to the tribunal, and fet an example of reverence for its authority, he began a long harangue, in which, with much art, and in terms extremely flattering to persons just entering upon their new function, he observed, that as the supreme ju-risdiction over the colony which they had planted was now vested in this court, he considered them as clothed with the authority, and reprefenting the person of their sovereign; that accordingly he would communicate to them what he deemed effential to the public safety, with the same dutiful fidelity as if he were addressing his royal master; that the security of a colony settled in a great empire, whose fovereign had already discovered his hostile intentions, depended uponarms, and the efficacy of these upon the subordination and discipline preserved among the troops; that his right to command was derived from a commission granted by the governor of Cuba; and as that had been long since revoked, the lawfulness of his jurisdiction might well be questioned; that he might be thought to act upon a defective, or even a dubious title; nor could they trust an army which might dispute the powers of its general, at a juncture when it ought implicitly to obey his orders; that, moved by these considerations, he now resigned all his authority to them, that they, having both right to choose, and power to confer full jurisdiction, might appoint one, in the king's name, to command the army in its future operations; and as for his own part, such was his zeal for the service in which they were engaged, that he would most cheerfully take up a pike with the same hand that laid down the general's truncheon, and convince his fellow-soldiers, that though accustomed to command, he had not forgotten how to obey. Having sinished his discourse, he laid the commission from Velasquez upon the table, and after kissing his truncheon, delivered it to the chief magistrate, and withdrew.

^{*} Villa rica de la vera Cruz.

The deliberations of the council were not long, as Cortes had concerted this important measure with his considents, and had prepared the other members with great address, for the part which he wished them to take. His resignation was accepted; and as the uninterrupted tenor of their prosperity under his conduct afforded the most satisfying evidence of his abilities for command, they, by their unanimous suffrage, elected him chief justice of the colony, and captain-general of its army, and appointed his commission to be made out in the king's name, with most ample powers, which were to continue in force until the royal pleasure should be farther known. That this deed might not be deemed the machination of a junto, the council called together the troops, and acquainted them with what had been resolved. The soldiers, with eager applause, ratissed the choice which which the council had made; the air refounded with the name of Cortes, and all vowed to shed their blood in support of his authority.

Cortes having now brought his intrigues to the defired iffue, and shaken off his mortifying dependence on the governor of Cuba, accepted of the commission which vested in him supreme jurisdiction, civil as well as military, over the colony, with many professions of respect to the council, and gratitude to the army. Together with his new command, he assumed greater dignity, and began to exercise more extensive powers. Formerly he had felt himself to be only the deputy of a subject; now he acted as the repre-fentative of his sovereign. The adherents of Velasquez, fully aware of what would be the effect of this change in the fituation of Cortes, could no longer continue filent and paffive spectators of his actions. They exclaimed openly against the proceedings of the council as illegal, and against those of the army as mutinous. Cortes, instantly perceiving the necessity of giving a timely check to fuch feditious discourse by fome vigorous measure, arrested Ordaz, Escudero, and Velasquez de Leon, the ringleaders of this faction, and fent them prisoners aboard the fleet, loaded with chains. Their dependents, aftonished and overawed, remained quiet; and Cortes, more defirous to reclaim than to punish his prisoners, who were officers of great merit, courted their friendship with such affiduity and address, that the reconciliation was perfectly cordial; and, on the most trying occafions, neither their connection with the governor of Cuba, nor the memory of the indignity with 1101 7 which which they had been treated, tempted them to fwerve from an inviolable attachment to his interest t. In this, as well as his other negotia-tions at this critical conjuncture, which decided with respect to his future fame and fortune, Cortes owed much of his success to the Mexican gold, which he distributed with a liberal hand both among his friends and his opponents ".

Cortes, having thus rendered the union between himself and his army indissoluble, by engaging it to join him in disclaiming any dependence on the governor of Cuba, and in repeated acts of disobedience to his authority, thought he might now venture to quit the camp in which he had hitherto remained, and advance into the country. To this he was encouraged by an event no less fortunate than seasonable. Some Indians having approached his camp in a mysterious manner, were introduced into his prefence. He found that they were fent with a proffer of friendship from the cazique of Zempoalla, a confiderable town at no great distance; and from their answers to a variety of questions which he put to them, according to his usual practice in every interview with the people of the country, he gathered, that their master, though subject to the Mexican empire, was impatient of the yoke, and filled with fuch dread and hatred of Montezuma, that nothing could be more acceptable to him than any prospect of deliverance from the oppression under which he groaned. On hearing this, a ray of light and hope broke in upon the mind of Cortes. He faw

that

B. Diaz: c. 42, 43. Gomara, Cron. c. 30, 31. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. v. c. 7. B. Diaz. c. 44. THE DOLLEY'S that the great empire which he intended to attack was neither perfectly united, nor its fovereign univerfally beloved. He concluded, that the causes of disaffection could not be confined to one province, but that in other corners there must be malecontents, so weary of subjection, or so desirous of change, as to be ready to follow the standard of any protector. Full of those ideas, on which he began to form a scheme, that time, and more perfect information concerning the state of the country, enabled him to mature, he gave a most gracious reception to the Zempoallans, and promifed foon to visit their cazique ".

In order to perform this promife, it was not necessary to vary the route which he had already fixed for his march. Some officers, whom he had employed to furvey the coast, having difcovered a village named Quiabiflan, about forty miles to the northward, which, both on account of the fertility of the foil, and commodiousness of the harbour, seemed to be a more proper station for a settlement than that where he was encamped, Cortes determined to remove thither. Zempoalla lay in his way, where the cazique received him in the manner which he had reason to expect; with gifts and careffes, like a man folicitous to gain his good-will; with respect approaching almost to adoration, like one who looked up to him as a deliverer. From him he learned many particulars with respect to the character of Montezuma, and the circumstances which rendered his dominion odious. He was a tyrant, as the cazique told him with tears, haughty; cruel, and fuspicious; who treated his own subjects with arrogance, ruined the conquered provinces by excessive exactions, and often tore their sons and daughters from them by violence; the former to be offered as victims to his gods; the latter to be reserved as concubines for himself or favourites. Cortes, in reply to him, artfully infinuated, that one great object of the Spaniards in visiting a country so remote from their own, was to redress grievances, and to relieve the oppressed; and having encouraged him to hope for this interposition in due time, he continued his march to Quiabislan.

B. Diaz. c. 41. Gomara, Cron. c. 28.

The spot which his officers had recommended as a proper fituation, appeared to him to be fo well chosen, that he immediately marked out ground for a town. The houses to be erected were only huts; but these were to be surrounded with fortifications, of fufficient strength to refist the affaults of an Indian army. As the finishing of those fortifications was effential to the existence of a colony, and of no less importance in profecuting the defigns which the leader and his followers meditated, both in order to secure a place of retreat, and to preserve their communication with the fea, every man in the army, officers as well as foldiers, put his hand to the work, Cortes himself setting them an example of activity and perseverance in labour. The Indians of Zempoalla and Quiabislan lent their aid; and this petty station, the parent of fo many mighty fettlements, was foon in a state of defence *. - will a y le . I have the form

x. B. Diaz. c. 45, 46. 48. Gomara, Cron. c. 32, 33.
37. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. v. c. 8, 9.

J

While engaged in this necessary work, Cortes had feveral interviews with the caziques of Zempoalla and Quiabislan; and availing himself of their wonder and astonishment at the new objects which they daily beheld, he gradually in-fpired them with fuch an high opinion of the Spaniards, as beings of a fuperior order, and irrefistible in arms, that, relying on their pro-tection, they ventured to infult the Mexican power, at the very name of which they were accustomed to tremble. Some of Montezuma's officers having appeared to levy the usual tribute, and to demand a certain number of human victims, as an expiation for their guilt in prefuming to hold intercourse with those strangers whom the emperor had commanded to leave his dominions, instead of obeying the order, the caziques made them prisoners, treated them with great indignity, and, as their superstition was no less barbarous than that of the Mexicans, they prepared to facrifice them to their gods. From this last danger they were delivered by the interposition of Cortes, who manifested the utmost horror at the mention of such a deed. The two caziques having now been pushed to an act of fuch open rebellion, as left them no hope of fafety but in attaching themselves inviolably to the Spaniards, they foon completed their union with them, by formally acknowledging them-felves to be vasfals of the same monarch. Their example was followed by the Totonaques, a fierce people who inhabited the mountainous part of the country. They willingly subjected themselves to the crown of Castile, and offered to accompany Cortes, with all their forces, in his march towards Mexico y.

Cortes had now been above three months in New Spain; and though this period had not been distinguished by martial exploits, every moment had been employed in operations, which, though less splendid, were more important. By his address in conducting his intrigues with his own army, as well as his faga-city in carrying on his negotiations with the natives, he had already laid the foundations of his future success. But whatever confidence he might place in the plan which he had formed, he could not but perceive, that as his title to command was derived from a doubtful authority, he held it by a precarious tenure. The injuries which Velafquez had received, were fuch as would naturally prompt him to apply for redress to their common sovereign; and such a representation, he forefaw, might be given of his conduct, that he had reason to apprehend, not only that he might be degraded from his present rank, but subjected to punishment. Before he began his march, it was necessary to take the most effectual precautions against this impending danger. With this view he per-fuaded the magistrates of the colony at Vera Cruz to address a letter to the king, the chief object of which was to justify their own conduct in establishing a colony independent on the jurisdiction of Velasquez. In order to accomplish this, they endeavoured to detract from his merit, in fitting out the two former armaments

vol. 11. o under

y B. Diaz. c. 47. Gomara, Cron. 35, 36. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. v. c. 9, 10, 11.

under Cordova and Grijalva, affirming that these had been equipped by the adventurers who engaged in the expeditions, and not by the governor. They contended that the fole object of Velasquez was to trade or barter with the natives, not to attempt the conquest of New Spain, or to fettle a colony there. They afferted that Cortes and the officers who ferved under him had defrayed the greater part of the expence in fitting out the armament. On this account, they humbly requested their fovereign to ratify what they had done in his name, and to confirm Cortes in the supreme command by his royal commission. That Charles might be induced to grant more readily what they de-manded, they give him a pompous description of the country which they had discovered; of its riches, the number of its inhabitants, their civilization and arts; they relate the progrefs which they had already made in annexing fome parts of the country fituated on the fea-coast to the crown of Castile; and mention the schemes which they had formed, as well as the hopes which they entertained, of reducing the whole to Subjection y. Cortes himself wrote in a similar

In this letter it is afferted, that though a confiderable number of Spaniards have been wounded in their various encounters with the people of Tabasco, not one of them died, and all had recovered in a very short time. This seems to confirm what I observe in p. 151, concerning the impersection of the offensive weapons used by the Americans. In this letter, the human facristices offered by the Mexicans to their deities are described minutely, and with great horror; some of the Spaniards, it is said, had been eye witnesses of those barbarous rites. To the letter is subjoined a catalogue strain; and as he knew that the Spanish court; accustomed to the exaggerated representations. of every new country by its discoverers, would give little credit to their splendid accounts of New Spain, if these were not accompanied with such a specimen of what it contained, as would excite an high idea of its opulence, he folicited his foldiers to relinquish what they might claim as their part of the treasures which had hitherto been collected, in order that the whole might be fent to the king. Such was the afcendant which he had acquired over their minds, and fuch their own romantic expectations of future wealth, that an army of indigent and rapacious adventurers was capable of this generous effort, and offered to their fovereign the richest present that had hitherto been transmitted from the New World z. Portocarrero and Montejo, the chief magistrates of the colony, were appointed to carry this present to Castile, with express orders not to touch at Cuba in their passage this ther a. While a vessel was preparing for their departure, an unexpected event occasioned a general alarm. Some foldiers and failors, secretly attached to Velasquez, or intimidated at the prospect of the dangers unavoidable in attempting to penetrate into the heart of a great empire with fuch unequal force, formed the defign of and description of the presents sent to the emperor. That published by Gomara, Cron. c. 29, seems to have been copied from it. Pet. Martyr describes many of the articles in his treatise. De insulis nuper inventis, p. 354, &c.

12 0100

² See Note CIV.

B. Diaz. c. 54. Gomara, Cron. c. 40.

feizing one of the brigantines, and making their escape to Cuba, in order to give the governor such intelligence as might enable him to intercept the ship which was to carry the treasure and dispatches to Spain. This conspiracy, though formed by persons of low rank, was conducted with prosound secrecy; but at the moment when every thing was ready for execution, they were betrayed by one of their associates.

Though the good fortune of Cortes interposed fo feafonably on this occasion, the detection of this conspiracy filled his mind with most disquieting apprehensions, and prompted him to execute a scheme which he had long revolved. He perceived that the spirit of disaffection still lurked among his troops; that, though hitherto checked by the uniform success of his schemes, or suppressed by the hand of authority, various events might occur which would encourage and call it forth. He observed, that many of his men, weary of the fatigue of service, longed to revisit their settlements in Cuba; and that upon any appearance of extraordinary danger, or any reverse of fortune, it would be impossible to restrain them from returning thither. He was fenfible that his forces, already too feeble, could bear no diminution, and that a very small defection of his followers would oblige him to abandon the enterprise. After ruminating often, and with much solicitude, upon those particulars, he saw no hope of success, but in cutting off all possibility of retreat, and in reducing his men to the necessity of adopting the same resolution with which he himself was animated, either to conquer or to perish. With this view, he determined to destroy his fleet; but as he durst not venture to execute fuch a bold resolution by his fingle authority, he laboured to bring his foldiers to adopt his ideas with respect to the propriety of this measure. His address in accomplishing this was not inferior to the arduous occafion in which it was employed. He perfuaded fome, that the ships had fuffered so much by having been long at fea, as to be altogether unfit for service; to others he pointed out what a feafonable reinforcement of strength they would derive from the junction of an hundred men, now unprofitably employed as failors; and to all, he represented the necessity of fixing their eyes and wishes upon what was before them; without allowing the idea of a retreat once to enter their thoughts. With universal confent the ships were drawn ashore, and after stripping them of their fails, rigging, iron works, and whatever else might be of use, they were broke in pieces. Thus, from an effort of magnanimity, to which there is nothing parallel in hiftory, five hundred men voluntarily confented to be shut up in a hostile country, filled with powerful and unknown nations; and having precluded every means of escape, left themselves without any resource but their own valour and perseverance b. 200 m/c 1/40

conquer

Nothing now retarded Cortes; the alacrity of his troops and the disposition of his allies were equally favourable. All the advantages, however, derived from the latter, though procured

b Relat. di Cortes. Ramus. iii, 225. B. Diaz. c. 57, 58. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. v. c. 14.

by much affiduity and address, were well nigh loft in a moment, by an indifcreet fally of religious zeal, which, on many occasions, precipitated Cortes into actions inconfistent with the prudence that distinguishes his character. Though hitherto he had neither time nor opportunity to explain to the natives the errors of their own superstition, or to instruct them in the principles of the Christian faith, he commanded his soldiers to overturn the altars and to destroy the idols in the chief temple of Zempoalla, and in their place to erect a crucifix and an image of the Virgin Mary. The people beheld this with aftonishment and horror; the priests excited them to arms; but fuch was the authority of Cortes, and fo great the afcendant which the Spaniards had acquired, that the commotion was appealed without bloodshed, and concord perfectly re-established c.

Cortes began his march from Zempoalla on the fixteenth of August, with five hundred men, fifteen horse, and six field-pieces. The rest of his troops, consisting chiefly of such as from age or infirmity were less sit for active service he lest as a garrison in Villa Rica, under the command of Escalante, an officer of merit, and warmly attached to his interest. The cazique of Zempoalla supplied him with provisions, and with two hundred of those Indians, ealled Tamemes, whose office, in a country where tame animals were unknown, was to carry burdens, and to perform all service labour. They were a great relief to the Spanish soldiers, who hitherto had been obliged, not only to carry their own baggage, but to drag along the artillery by main force. He offered likewise a confiderable body of his troops, but Cortes was satisfied with four hundred; taking care, however, to choose persons of such note as might prove hostages for the fidelity of their master. Nothing memorable happened in his progress, until he arrived on the confines of Tlascala. The inhabitants of that province, a warlike people, were implacable enemies of the Mexicans, and had been united in an ancient alliance with the caziques of Zempoalla. Though less civilized than the subjects of Montezuma, they were advanced in improvement far beyond the rude nations of America, whose manners we have described. They had made considerable progrefs in agriculture; they dwelt in large towns; they were not strangers to some species of commerce; and in the imperfect accounts of their institutions and laws, transmitted to us by the early Spanish writers, we discern traces both of distributive justice and of criminal juris-diction, in their interior police. But still, as the degree of their civilization was incomplete, and as they depended for subfishence not on agriculture alone, but trusted for it, in a great measure, to hunting, they retained many of the qualities natural to men in this state. Like them, they were fierce and revengeful; like them, too, they were high-spirited and independent. In consequence of the former, they were involved in perpetual hoftilities, and had but a flender and occasional intercourse with neighbouring states. The latter inspired them with such detestation of servitude, that they not only refused to stoop to a foreign voke.

B. Diaz. c. 41, 42. Herrega, dec. 2. lib. v. c. 3, 4.

yoke, and maintained an obstinate and successful contest in defence of their liberty against the superior power of the Mexican empire, but they guarded with equal solicitude against domestic tyranny; and distaining to acknowledge any master, they lived under the mild and limited jurisdiction of a council elected by their several tribes.

Cortes, though he had received information concerning the martial character of this people, flattered himself that his professions of delivering the oppressed from the tyranny of Montezuma, their inveterate enmity to the Mexicans, and the example of their ancient allies the Zempoallans, might induce the Tlascalans to grant him a friendly reception. In order to dispose them to this, four Zempoallans of great eminence were fent ambassadors, to request, in his name, and in that of their cazique, that they would permit the Spaniards to pass through the territories of the republic in their way to Mexico. But inflead of the favourable answer which was expected, the Tlascalans seized the ambassadors, and, without any regard to their public character, made preparations for facrificing them to their gods. At the same time, they assembled their troops, in order to oppose those unknown invaders, if they should attempt to make their passage good by force of arms. Various motives concurred in precipitating the Tlascalans into this resolution. A fierce people, shut up within its own narrow precincts, and little accustomed to any intercourse with foreigners, is apt to confider every stranger as an enemy, and is easily excited to arms. They concluded from Cortes's proposal of visiting Montezuma in his capital, that.

that, notwithstanding all his professions, he courted the friendship of a monarch whom they both hated and seared. The imprudent zeal of Cortes in violating the temples in Zempoalla, silled the Tlascalans with horror; and as they were no less attached to their superstition than the other nations of New Spain, they were impatient to avenge their injured gods, and to acquire the merit of offering up to them, as victims, those impious men who had dared to profane their altars; they contemned the small number of the Spaniards, as they had not yet measured their own strength with that of these new enemies, and had no idea of the superiority which they derived from their arms and discipline.

Cortes, after waiting fome days, in vain, for the return of his ambassadors, advanced [Aug. 30] into the Tlascalan territories. As the resolutions of people who delight in war are executed with no less promptitude than they are formed, he found troops in the field ready to oppose him. They attacked him with great intrepidity, and, in the first encounter, wounded some of the Spaniards, and killed two horses; a loss, in their fituation, of great moment, because it was irreparable. From this specimen of their courage, Cortes faw the necessity of proceeding with caution. His army marched in close order; he chose the stations, where he halted, with attention, and fortified every camp with extraordinary care. During fourteen days he was exposed to almost uninterrupted assaults, the Tlascalans advancing with numerous armies, and renewing the attack in various forms, with a degree of valour and perseverance to which the Spaniards had feen nothing parallel in the New World. The Spanish historians describe those successive battles with great pomp, and enter into a minute detail of particulars, mingling many exaggerated and incredible circumstances d, with such as are real and marvellous. But no power of words can render the recital of a combat interesting, where there is no equality of danger; and when the narrative closes with an account of thousands slain on the one fide, while not a fingle person falls on the other, the most laboured descriptions of the pre-vious disposition of the troops, or of the various viciffitudes in the engagement, command no attention.

a de-

There are some circumstances, however, in this war, which are memorable, and merit notice, as they throw light upon the character both of the people of New Spain, and of their conquerors. Though the Tlascalans brought into the field fuch numerous armies as appear fufficient to have overwhelmed the Spaniards, they were never able to make any impression upon their small battallion. Singular as this may feem, it is not inexplicable. The Tlascalans, though addicted to war, were, like all unpolished nations, strangers to military order and discipline, and lost in a great measure the advantage which they might have derived from their numbers, and the impetuosity of their attack, by their constant solicitude to carry off the dead and wounded. This point of honour, founded on a fentiment of tenderness natural to the human mind, and strengthened by anxiety to preserve the bodies of their countrymen from being devoured by their enemies, was univerfal among the people of New Spain. Attention to this pious office occupied them even during the heat of combate, broke their union, and diminished the force of the impression which they might have made by a joint effort.

The same

Not only was their superiority in number of little avail, but the imperfection of their military weapons rendered their valour in a great measure inosfensive. After three battles, and many skirmishes and assaults, not one Spaniard was killed in the field. Arrows and spears, headed with flint or the bones of fishes, stakes hardened in the fire, and wooden fwords, though destructive weapons among naked Indians, were eafily turned afide by the Spanish bucklers, and could hardly penetrate the escaupiles, or quilted jackets, which the soldiers wore. The Tlascalans advanced boldly to the charge, and often fought hand to hand. Many of the Spaniards were wounded, though all flightly, which cannot be imputed to any want of courage or strength in their enemies, but to the defect of the arms with which they affailed them.

Notwithstanding the fury with which the Tlascalans attacked the Spaniards, they scem to have conducted their hostilities with some degree of barbarous generofity. They gave the Spaniards warning of their hostile intentions, and as they knew that their invaders wanted provisions, and imagined, perhaps, like the other Americans, that they had left their own country

e B. Diaz. c. 65.

because it did not afford them subsistence, they sent to their camp a large supply of poultry and maize, desiring them to eat plentifully, because they scorned to attack an enemy enseebled by hunger, and it would be an affront to their gods to offer them samished victims, as well as disagreeable to themselves to feed on such emaciated

When they were taught by the first encounter with their new enemies, that it was not easy to execute his threat; when they perceived, in the subsequent engagements, that notwithstanding all the efforts of their own valour, of which they had a very high opinion, not one of the Spaniards was slain or taken, they began to conceive them to be a superior order of beings, against whom human power could not avail. In this extremity, they had recourse to their priests, requiring them to reveal the mysterious causes of such extraordinary events, and to declare what new means they should employ in order to repulse those formidable invaders. The priests, after many facrifices and incantations, delivered this response. That these strangers were the offspring of the fun, procreated by his animating energy in the regions of the east; that, by day, while cherished with the influence of his parental beams, they were invincible; but by night, when his reviving heat was withdrawn, their vigour declined and faded like the herbs in the field, and they dwindled down into mortal men g. Theories less plausible have gained credit with more enlightened nations,

g B. Diaz, c. 66.

f Herrera, dec. 2. lib. vi. c. 6. Gomara, Cron. c. 47.

and have influenced their conduct. In confequence of this, the Tlascalans, with the implicit confidence of men who fancy themselves to be under the guidance of Heaven, acted in contradiction to one of their most established maxims in war, and ventured to attack the enemy, with a strong body, in the night-time, in hopes of destroying them when enseebled and surprised. But Cortes had greater vigilance and discernment than to be deceived by the rude stratagems of an Indian army. The centinels at his outposts, observing some extraordinary movement among the Tlascalans, gave the alarm. In a moment the troops were under arms, and fallying out, dispersed the party with great slaughter, without allowing it to approach the camp. The Tlascalans, convinced, by sad experience, that their priefts had deluded them, and fatisfied that they attempted in vain, either to deceive or to vanquish their enemies, their fierceness abated, and they began to incline feriously to peace.

They were at a loss, however, in what manner to address the strangers, what idea to form of their character, and whether to confider them as beings of a gentle or of a malevolent nature. There were circumstances in their conduct which feemed to favour each opinion. On the one hand, as the Spaniards constantly dismissed the prisoners whom they took, not only without injury, but often with presents of European toys, and renewed their offers of peace after every victory; this lenity amazed people, who, according to the exterminating fystem of war known in America, were accustomed to sacrifice and devour without mercy all the captives taken in battle, and disposed them to entertain favourable sentiments of the humanity of their new enemies. But, on the other hand, as Cortes had feized fifty of their countrymen who brought provisions to his camp, and, supposing them to be spies, had cut off their hands h; this bloody spectacle, added to the terror occasioned by the fire-arms and horses, filled them with dreadful impressions of the ferocity of their invaders. This uncertainty was apparent in the mode of addressing the Spaniards. "If," faid they, " you are divinities of a cruel and favage nature, we present to you five slaves, that you may drink their blood, and eat their flesh. If you are mild deities, accept an offering of incense and variegated plumes. If you are men, here is meat, and bread and fruit to nourish you'k." The peace, which both parties now defired with equal ardour, was foon concluded. The Tlafcalans yielded themselves as vassals to the crown of Castile, and engaged to affift Cortes in all his future operations. He took the republic under his protection, and promised to defend their persons and possessions from injury or violence.

YOL. II.

in

This treaty was concluded at a feafonable juncture for the Spaniards. The fatigue of fervice among a small body of men, surrounded by such a multitude of enemies, was incredible. Half the army was on duty every night, and even they whose turn it was to rest, slept always upon their arms, that they might be ready to run to their posts on a moment's warning. Many of them were wounded, a good number, and among these Cortes himself, laboured under the distempers prevalent in hot climates, and several had died since they set out from Vera Cruz. Notwithstanding the supplies which they received from the Tlascalans, they were often in want of provisions, and so destitute of the necessaries most requifite in dangerous fervice, that they had no falve to dress their wounds, but what was composed with the fat of the Indians whom they had flain 1. Worn out with fuch intolerable toil and hardships, many of the foldiers began to murmur, and, when they reflected on the multitude and boldness of their enemies, more were ready to despair. It required the utmost exertion of Cortes's authority and address to check this spirit of despondency in its progress, and to re-animate his followers with their wonted sense of their own superiority over the enemies with whom they had to contend m. The submission of the Tlascalans, and their own triumphant, entry into the capital city, where they were received with the reverence paid to beings of a superior order, banished, at once, from the minds of the Spaniards, all memory of past sufferings, dispelled every anxious thought with respect to their future operations, and fully fatisfied them that there was not now any power in America able to withstand their arms n.

b Cortes, Relat. Ramuf. iii. 228. C. Gomara, Cron. c. 48. See Note CVI. B. Diaz. c.70. Gomara, Cron. c. 47. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. vi. c. 7.

Cortes remained twenty days in Tlascala, in order to allow his troops a short interval of re-

m Cortes, Relat. Ramuf, 1 B. Diaz. c. 62. 65. iii. 229. B. Diaz. c. 69. Gomara, Cron. c. 51.

n Cortes, Relat, Ramus. iii. 230. B. Diaz. c. 72.

pose after such hard service. During that time, he was employed in transactions and inquiries of great moment with respect to his future schemes. In his daily conferences with the Tlascalan chiefs, he received information concerning every particular relative to the state of the Mexican empire, or to the qualities of its fovereign, which could be of use in regulating his conduct, whether he should be obliged to act as a friend or as an enemy. As he found that the antipathy of his new allies to the Mexican nation was no less implacable than had been represented, and perceived what benefit he might derive from the aid of fuch powerful confederates, he employed all his powers of infinuation in order to gain their confidence. Nor was any extraordinary exertion of these necessary. The Tlascalans, with the levity of mind natural to unpolished men, were, of their own accord, disposed to run from the extreme of hatred to that of fondness. Every thing in the appearance and conduct of their guests, was to them matter of wonder. They gazed with admiration at whatever the Spaniards did, and fancying them to be of heavenly origin, were eager not only to comply with their demands, but to anticipate their wishes. They offered, accordingly, to accompany Cortes in his march to Mexico, with all the forces of the republic, under the command of their most experienced captains.

But, after bestowing so much pains on cementing this union, all the beneficial fruits of it were on the point of being lost, by a new effusion of that intemperate religious zeal with 1519.]

which Cortes was animated, no lefs than the other adventurers of the age. They all confidered themselves as instruments employed by Heaven to propagate the Christian faith, and the less they were qualified, either by their knowledge or morals, for such a function, they were more eager to discharge it. The profound veneration of the Tlascalans for the Spaniards, having encouraged Cortes to explain to fome of their chiefs the doctrines of the Christian religion, and to infift that they should abandon their own superstitions, and embrace the faith of their new friends, they, according to an idea univerfal among barbarous nations, readily acknowledged the truth and excellence of what he taught; but contended, that the Teules of Tlascala were divinities no less than the God in whom the Spaniards believed; and as that Being was entitled to the homage of Europeans, fo they were bound to revere the fame powers which their ancestors had worshipped. Cortes continued, nevertheless, to urge his demand in a tone of authority, mingling threats with his arguments, until the Tlascalans could bear it no longer, and conjured him never to mention this again, lest the gods should avenge on their heads the guilt of having listened to such a proposition. Cortes, astonished and enraged at their obstinacy, prepared to execute by force, what he could not accomplish by persuasion, and was going to overturn their altars, and cast down their idols with the same violent hand as at Zempoalla, if father Bartholomew de Olmedo, chaplain to the expedition, had not checked his inconsiderate impetuosity. He represented the imprudence 21:

imprudence of fuch an attempt in a large city newly reconciled, and filled with people no less fuperstitious than warlike; he declared, that the proceeding at Zempoalla had always appeared to him precipitate and unjust; that religion was not to be propagated by the sword, or infidels to be converted by violence; that other weapons were to be employed in this ministry: patient instruction must enlighten the understanding, and pious example captivate the heart, before men could be induced to abandon error, and embrace the truth P. Amidst scenes, where a narrow-minded bigotry appears in fuch close union with oppression and cruelty, senti-ments so liberal and humane sooth the mind with unexpected pleasure; and at a time when the rights of conscience were little understood in the Christian world, and the idea of toleration unknown, one is aftonished to find a Spanish monk of the fixteenth century among the first advocates against persecution, and in behalf of religious liberty. The remonstrances of an ecclefiaftic, no less respectable for wisdom than virtue, had their proper weight with Cortes. He left the Tlascalans in the undisturbed exercise of their own rites, requiring only that they should defist from their horrid practice of offering human victims in facrifice.

Cortes, as foon as his troops were fit for fervice, refolved to continue his march towards Mexico, notwithstanding the earnest disfuasives of the Tlascalans, who represented his destruction as unavoidable, if he put himself in the power of a prince so faithless and cruel as Montezuma.

B. Diaz. c. 77. p. 54. c. 83. p. 61.

IBD rayton sculp ... Two lighed Feb. n 1801, by Cadell & Davies, Strand .

As he was accompanied by fix thousand Tlascalans, he had now the command of forces which resembled a regular army. They directed their course towards Cholula [Oct. 13]; Montezuma, who had at length confented to admit the Spaniards into his presence, having informed Cortes, that he had given orders for his friendly reception there. Cholula was a considerable town, and, though only five leagues distant from Tlascala, was formerly an independent state, but had been lately subjected to the Mexican empire. This was considered by all the people of New Spain as a holy place, the sanctuary and chief seat of their gods, to which pilgrims reforted from every province, and a greater num-ber of human victims were offered in its principal temple than even in that of Mexico 9. Montezuma feems to have invited the Spaniards thither, either from some superstitious hope that the gods would not fuffer this facred mansion to be defiled, without pouring down their wrath upon those impious strangers, who ventured to insult their power in the place of its peculiar resi-dence; or from a belief that he himself might there attempt to cut them off with more certain fuccess, under the immediate protection of his divinities.

Cortes had been warned by the Tlascalans, before he set out on his march, to keep a watchful eye over the Cholulans. He himself, though received into the town with much seeming respect and cordiality, observed several circumstances

Torquemada, Monar. Ind. i. 281, 282. ii. 291. Go-mara, Cron. c. 61. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. vii. c. 2.

SOUTH FOR

stances in their conduct which excited suspicion. Two of the Tlascalans, who were encamped at some distance from the town, as the Cholulans refused to admit their ancient enemies within its precincts, having found means to enter in disguise, acquainted Cortes, that they observed the women and children of the principal citizens retiring in great hurry every night; and that fix children had been facrificed in the chief temple, a rite which indicated the execution of fome warlike enterprise to be approaching. At the same time, Marina the interpreter received information from an Indian woman of distinction, whose confidence she had gained, that the destruction of her friends was concerted; that a body of Mexican troops lay concealed near the town; that some of the streets were barricaded, and in others, pits or deep trenches were dug, and slightly covered over, as traps into which the horses might fall; that stones or missive weapons were collected on the tops of the temples, with which to overwhelm the infantry; that the fatal hour was now at hand, and their ruin unavoidable. Cortes, alarmed at this concurring evidence, fecretly arrested three of the chief priests, and extorted from them a confession, that consirmed the intelligence which he had received. As not a moment was to be loft, he inftantly refolved to prevent his enemies, and to inflict on them such dreadful vengeance as might strike Montezuma and his subjects with terror. For this purpose, the Spaniards and Zempoallans were drawn up in a large court, which had been allotted for their quarters, near the centre of the town, the Tlascalans had orders to advance; the magistrates and several of the chief citizens were sent for, under various pretexts, and seized. On a signal given, the troops rushed out, and fell upon the multitude, destitute of leaders, and so much astonished, that the weapons drop-ping from their hands, they stood motionless, and incapable of defence. While the Spaniards pressed them in front, the Tlascalans attacked them in the rear. The streets were filled with bloodshed and death. The temples, which afforded a retreat to the priests and some of the leading men, were set on fire, and they perished in the slames. This scene of horror continued two days; during which, the wretched in-habitants suffered all that the destructive rage of the Spaniards, or the implacable revenge of their Indian allies, could inflict. At length the carnage ceased, after the slaughter of fix thousand Cholulans, without the loss of a fingle Spaniard. Cortes then released the magistrates, and re-proaching them bitterly for their intended treachery, declared, that as justice was now appealed, he forgave the offence, but required them to recal the citizens who had sled, and reestablish order in the town. Such was the ascendant which the Spaniards had acquired over this fuperstitious race of men, and so deeply were they impressed with an opinion of their superior discernment, as well as power, that, in obedience to this command, the city was in a few days filled again with people, who, amidst the ruins of their facred buildings, yielded respectful fervice to men, whose hands were stained with with the blood of their relations and fellow-citizens.

From Cholula, Cortes advanced directly towards Mexico [Oct. 29], which was only twenty leagues distant. In every place through which he passed, he was received as a person possessed of sufficient power to deliver the empire from the oppression under which it groaned; and the caziques or governors communicated to him all the grievances which they felt under the tyrannical government of Montezuma, with that unreferved confidence which men naturally repose in superior beings. When Cortes first observed the feeds of discontent in the remote provinces of the empire, hope dawned upon his mind; but when he now discovered such symptoms of alienation from their monarch near the feat of government, he concluded that the vital parts of the constitution were affected, and conceived the most fanguine expectations of overturning a state, whose natural strength was thus divided and impaired. While those reflections encouraged the general to perfift in his arduous undertaking, the foldiers were no less animated by observations more obvious to their capacity. In descending from the mountains of Chalco, across which the road lay, the vast plain of Mexico opened gradually to their view. When they first beheld this prospect, one of the most striking and beautiful on the face of the earth; when they observed fertile and cultivated fields, stretching farther than the eye could reach; when they

r Cortes, Relat. Ramus. iii. 231. B. Diaz. c. 83. Gomara, Cron. c. 64. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. vii. c. 1, 2. See Note CVIII.

faw a lake refembling the sea in extent, encom-passed with large towns, and discovered the ca-pital city rising upon an island in the middle, adorned with its temples and turrets; the scene fo far exceeded their imagination, that some be-lieved the fanciful descriptions of romance were realized, and that its enchanted palaces and gilded domes were presented to their sight; others could hardly persuade themselves that this wonderful spectacle was any thing more than a dream. As they advanced, their doubts were removed, but their amazement increased. They were now fully satisfied that the country was rich beyond any conception which they had formed of it, and flattered themselves that at length they should obtain an ample recompence for all their services and sufferings.

Hitherto they had met with no enemy to oppose their progress, though several circumstances occurred which led them to suspect that some defign was formed to surprise and cut them off. Many messengers arrived successively from Mon-tezuma, permitting them one day to advance, requiring them on the next to retire, as his hopes or fears alternately prevailed; and fo wonderful was this infatuation, which feems to be unaccountable on any supposition but that of a superstitious dread of the Spaniards, as beings of a superior nature, that Cortes was almost at the gates of the capital, before the monarch had determined whether to receive him as a friend, or to oppose him as an enemy. But as no fign of open hostility appeared, the Spaniards, without regarding the sluctuations of Montezuma's fentiments, continued their march along the causeway which led to Mexico through the lake, with great circumspection and the strictest discipline, though without seeming to suspect the prince whom they were about to visit.

When they drew near the city, about a thoufand persons, who appeared to be of distinction, came forth to meet them, adorned with plumes, and clad in mantles of fine cotton. Each of these, in his order, passed by Cortes, and saluted him according to the mode deemed most respect-ful and submissive in their country. They an-nounced the approach of Montezuma himself, and soon after his harbingers came in sight. There appeared first two hundred persons in an uniform dress, with large plumes of feathers, alike in fashion, marching two and two, in deep filence, bare-footed, with their eyes fixed on the ground. These were followed by a company of higher rank, in their most showy apparel, in the midst of whom was Montezuma, in a chair or litter richly ornamented with gold, and feathers of various colours. Four of his principal favourites carried him on their shoulders, others supported a canopy of curious workmanship over his head. Before him marched three officers with rods of gold in their hands, which they lifted up on high at certain intervals, and at that fignal all the people bowed their heads, and hid their faces, as unworthy to look on fo great a monarch. When he drew near, Cortes dismounted, advancing towards him with officious haste, and in a respectful posture. At the same time Montezuma alighted from his chair, and leaning on the arms of two of his near relations.

T.Swithard E.A del.

LG.Walker sculp .

Published Fib. n 1801, by Cadell & Davies, Strand .

lations, approached with a flow and stately pace, his attendants covering the street with cotton cloths, that he might not touch the ground. Cortes accosted him with profound reverence, after the European fashion. He returned the falutation, according to the mode of his country, by touching the earth with his hand, and then kiffing it. This ceremony, the customary expression of veneration from inferiors towards those who were above them in rank, appeared fuch amazing condescension in a proud monarch, who scarcely deigned to consider the rest of mankind as of the same species with himself, that all his fubjects firmly believed those persons, before whom he humbled himself in this manner, to be fomething more than human. Accordingly, as they marched through the crowd, the Spaniards frequently, and with much fatisfaction. heard themselves denominated Teules, or divinities. Nothing material passed in this first interview. Montezuma conducted Cortes to the quarters which he had prepared for his reception, and immediately took leave of him, with a politeness not unworthy of a court more refined. "You are now," says he, "with your brothers in your own house; refresh yourselves after your fatigue, and be happy until I return t." The place allotted to the Spaniards for their lodging was a house built by the father of Montezuma. It was furrounded by a stonewall, with towers at proper distances, which ferved for defence as well as for ornament, and its apartments and courts were fo large, as to accommodate both the Spaniards and their Indian allies. The first care of Cortes was to take precautions for his fecurity, by planting the artillery fo as to command the different avenues which led to it, by appointing a large division of his troops to be always on guard, and by post-ing centinels at proper stations with injunctions to observe the same vigilant discipline as if they were within fight of an enemy's camp.

VOL. 11.

^{}Cortes, Relat. Ramus. iii. 232-235. B. Diaz. c. 83. —88. Gomara, Cron. c. 64, 65. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. vii. 6. 3, 4, 5.

In the evening, Montezuma returned to visit his guests with the same pomp as in their first interview, and brought presents of such value, not only to Cortes and to his officers, but even to the private men, as proved the liberality of the monarch to be fuitable to the opulence of his kingdom. A long conference enfued, in which Cortes learned what was the opinion of Montezuma with respect to the Spaniards. It was an established tradition, he told him, among the Mexicans, that their ancestors came originally from a remote region, and conquered the provinces now subject to his dominion; that after they were fettled there, the great captain who conducted this colony returned to his own country, promising, that at some future period his descendants should visit them, assume the government, and reform their constitution and laws; that, from what he had heard and feen of Cortes and his followers, he was convinced that they were the very persons whose appearance the Mexican traditions and prophecies taught them to expect; that accordingly he had received them, not as strangers, but as relations of the fame blood and parentage, and defired that they might confider themselves as masters in his do-minious, for both himself and his subjects should be ready to comply with their will, and even to prevent their wishes. Cortes made a reply in his usual style with respect to the dignity and power of his fovereign, and his intention in fending him into that country; artfully endeayouring fo to frame his discourse, that it might coincide as much as possible with the idea which Montezuma had formed concerning the origin of the Spaniards. Next morning, Cortes and some of his principal attendants, were admitted to a public audience of the emperor. The three fubfequent days were employed in viewing the city; the appearance of which, so far superior in the order of its buildings and the number of its inhabitants to any place the Spaniards had beheld in America, and yet so little resembling the structure of an European city, filled them with furprife and admiration.

called by the natives, is fituated in a large plain, environed by mountains of fuch height, that, though within the torrid zone, the temperature of its climate is mild and healthful. All the moisture which descends from the high grounds is collected in several lakes, the two largest of which, of about ninety miles in circuit, com-municate with each other. The waters of the one are fresh, those of the other brackish. On the banks of the latter, and on some small islands adjoining to them, the capital of Montezuma's empire was built. The access to the city was by artificial causeways or streets formed of stones and waters

Mexico, or Tenuchtitlan, as it was anciently

earth, about thirty feet in breadth, As the waters of the lake during the rainy season overflowed the flat country, these causeways were of considerable length. That of Tacuba, on the west, extended a mile and a half; that of Tepeaca t, on the north-west, three miles; that of Cuoyacan, towards the fouth, fix miles. On the east there was no causeway, and the city could be approached only by canoes ". In each of these causeways were openings at proper intervals, through which the waters flowed, and over these beams of timber were laid, which being covered with earth, the causeway or street had every-where an uniform appearance. As the approaches to the city were fingular, its construction was remarkable. Not only the temples of their gods, but the houses belonging to the monarch, and to persons of distinction, were of fuch dimensions, that, in comparison with any other buildings which had been hitherto discovered in America, they might be termed magnificent. The habitations of the common people were mean, refembling the huts of other Indians. But they were all placed in a regular manner, on the banks of the canals which passed through the city, in some of its districts, or on the sides of the streets which intersected it in other quar-In feveral places were large openings or squares,

12 11017

t I am indebted to M, Clavigero for correcting an error of importance in my description of Mexico. From the east, where Tezeuco was situated, there was no causeway, as I have observed, and yet by some inattention on my part, or on that of the printer, in all of the former editions one of the causeways was said to lead to Tezeuco. M. Clavigero's measurement of the length of these causeways differs somewhat from that which I have adopted from F. Torribio, Clavig. ii. p. 73.

fquares, one of which, allotted for the great market, is faid to have been fo spacious, that forty or fifty thousand persons carried on traffic there. In this city, the pride of the New World, and the noblest monument of the industry and art of man, while unacquainted with the use of iron, and destitute of aid from any domestic animal, the Spaniards, who are most moderate in their computations, reckon that there were at least fixty thousand inhabitants x.

But how much soever the novelty of those objects might amuse or astonish the Spaniards, they felt the utmost solicitude with respect to their own fituation. From a concurrence of circumstances, no less unexpected than favourable to their progress, they had been allowed to penetrate into the heart of a powerful kingdom, and were now lodged in its capital, withcut having once met with open opposition from its monarch. The Tlascalans, however, had carneftly diffuaded them from placing fuch confdence in Montezuma, as to enter a city of fach a peculiar fituation as Mexico, where that prince would have them at mercy, shut up as i were in a snare, from which it was impossible to escape. They assured him that the Mexicin priests had, in the name of the gods, counfilled their fovereign to admit the Spaniards into the capital, that he might cut them off there at me blow with perfect fecurity . They now perceived, too plainly, that the apprehensions of their allies were not destitute of foundation; that, by breaking the bridges placed at certain intervals on the causeways, or by destroying part of the causeways themselves, their retreat would be rendered impracticable, and they must remain cooped up in the centre of a hostile city, surrounded by multitudes sufficient to overwhelm them, and without a possibility of receiving aid from their allies. Montezuma had, indeed, received them with distinguished respect. But ought they to reckon upon this as real, or to consider it as seigned? Even if it were sincere, could they promise on its continuance? Their safety depended upon the will of a monarch in whose attachment they had no reason to conside; and an order slowing from his caprice, or a word uttered by him in passion, might decide irrevocably concerning their sate z.

Ctta de Mexico, par un Gentelhuomo del Cortese. Rane. ibd. 304. E. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. vii. c. 14, &c. B. Diaz. c. 85, 86.

These resections, so obvious as to occur to the meanest soldier, did not escape the vigilart sagacity of their general. Before he set out from Cholula, Cortes had received advice from Villa Rica 2, that Qualpopoca, one of the Mexican generals on the frontiers, having assembled an army in order to attack some of the people whom the Spaniards had encouraged to throw off the Mexican yoke, Escalante had marched out with part of the garrison to support his allies; that an engagement had ensued, in which, though the Spaniards were victorious, Escalante, with seven of his men, had been mortally wounded, his horse killed, and me Spaniard had been surrounded by the enemy, z B. Diaz. c. 94.

Cortes, Relat. Ram. iii. 235. C.

and taken alive; that the head of this unfortunate captive, after being carried in triumph to different cities, in order to convince the people that their invaders were not immortal, had been fent to Mexico b. Cortes, though alarmed with this intelligence, as an indication of Montezuma's hostile intentions, had continued his march. But as foon as he entered Mexico. he became fensible, that, from an excess of confidence in the fuperior valour and discipline of his troops, as well as from the disadvantage of having nothing to guide him in an unknown country, but the defective intelligence which he had received from people with whom his mode of communication was very imperfect, he had pushed forward into a fituation, where it was difficult to continue, and from which it was dangerous to retire. Difgrace, and perhaps ruin, was the certain consequence of attempting the latter. The fuccess of his enterprise depended upon supporting the high opinion which the people of New Spain had formed with respect to the irresistible power of his arms. Upon the first fymptom of timidity on his part, their veneration would cease, and Montezuma, whom fear alone restrained at present, would let loose upon him the whole force of his empire. At the same time, he knew that the countenance of his own fovereign was to be obtained only by a feries of victories, and that nothing but the merit of extraordinary fuccess could screen his conduct from the censure of irregularity. From all these confiderations, it was necessary to maintain his station, and to extricate himself out of the difficulties in which one bold step had involved him, by venturing upon another still bolder. The situation was trying, but his mind was equal to it; and after revolving the matter with deep attention, he sixed upon a plan no less extraordinary than daring. He determined to seize Montezuma in his palace, and to carry him as a prisoner to the Spanish quarters. From the superstitious veneration of the Mexicans for the person of their monarch, as well as their implicit submission to his will, he hoped, by having Montezuma in his power, to acquire the supreme direction of their affairs; or, at least, with such a facred pledge in his hands, he made no doubt of being secure from any effort of their violence.

B. Diaz. c. 93, 94. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. viii. c. 1.

This he immediately proposed to his officers. The timid startled at a measure so audacious, and raised objections. The more intelligent and resolute, conscious that it was the only resource in which there appeared any prospect of safety, warmly approved of it, and brought over their companions so cordially to the same opinion, that it was agreed instantly to make the attempt. At his usual hour of vititing Montezuma, Cortes went to the palace, accompanied by Alvarado, Sandoval, Lugo, Velasquez de Leon, and Davila, sive of his principal officers, and as many trusty soldiers. Thirty chosen men sollowed, not in regular order, but sauntering at some distance, as if they had no object but curiosity; small parties were posted at proper intervals, in all the streets leading from the Spanish quarters to the court; and the remainder of his troops, with the Tlascalan allies, were under arms, ready to fally out on the first alarm. Cortes and his attendants were admitted without suspicion; the Mexicans retiring, as usual, out of respect. He addressed the monarch in a tone very different from that which he had employed in former conferences, reproaching him bitterly as the author of the violent asfault made upon the Spaniards by one of his officers, and demanded public reparation for the loss which they had sustained by the death of some of their companions, as well as for the infult offered to the great prince whose servants they were. Montezuma, confounded at this unexpected accusation, and changing colour, either from consciousness of guilt, or from feeling the indignity with which he was treated, af-ferted his own innocence with great earnestness, and, as a proof of it, gave orders instantly to bring Qualpopoca and his accomplices prisoners to Mexico. Cortes replied, with seeming complaisance, that a declaration so respectable left no doubt remaining in his own mind, but that fomething more was requifite to fatisfy his fol-lowers, who would never be convinced that Montezuma did not harbour hostile intentions against them, unless, as an evidence of his confidence and attachment, he removed from his own palace, and took up his residence in the Spanish quarters, where he should be served and honoured as became a great monarch. The first mention of fo strange a proposal bereaved Montezuma of speech, and almost of motion. At length, indignation gave him utterance, and he haughtily answered, "That persons of his rank were not accustomed voluntarily to give up themthemselves as prisoners; and were he mean enough to do so, his subjects would not permit such an affront to be offered to their sovereign." Cortes, unwilling to employ force, endeavoured alternately to sooth and to intimidate him. The altercation became warm; and having continued above three hours, Velasquez de Leon, an impetuous and gallant young man, exclaimed with impatience, "Why waste more time in vain? Let us either seize him instantly, or stab him to the heart." The threatening voice and sierce gestures with which these words were uttered, struck Montezuma. The Spaniards, he was sensible, had now proceeded so far, as left him no hope that they would recede. His own danger was imminent, the necessity unavoidable. He saw both, and abandoning himself to his fate, complied with their request.

His officers were called. He communicated to them his resolution. Though assonished and afflicted, they presumed not to question the will of their master, but carried him in silent pomp, all bathed in tears, to the Spanish quarters. When it was known that the strangers were conveying away the emperor, the people broke out into the wildest transports of grief and rage, threatening the Spaniards with immediate destruction, as the punishment justly due to their impious audacity. But as soon as Montezuma appeared with a seeming gaiety of countenance, and waved his hand, the tumult was hushed, and upon his declaring it to be of his own choice that he went to reside for some time among his new friends, the multitude, taught to revere

La to got to the to the transport

-Jackly

every

every intimation of their fovereign's pleasure, quietly dispersed.

Thus was a powerful prince seized by a few strangers in the midst of his capital, at noonday, and carried off as a prisoner without opposition or bloodshed. History contains nothing parallel to this event, either with respect to the temerity of the attempt, or the fuccess of the execution; and were not all the circumstances of this extraordinary transaction authenticated by the most unquestionable evidence, they would appear so wild and extravagant, as to go far beyond the bounds of that probability which must be preferved even in fictitious narrations.

Montezuma was received in the Spanish quarters with all the ceremonious respect which Cortes had promised. He was attended by his own domestics, and served with his usual state. His principal officers had free access to him, and he carried on every function of government as if he had been at perfect liberty. The Spaniards, however, watched him with the fcrupulous vigilance which was natural in guarding fuch an important prize d, endeavouring at the fame time to footh and reconcile him to his fituation, by every external demonstration of regard and attachment. But from captive princes the hour of humiliation and fuffering is never far distant. Qualpopoca, his fon, and five of the principal officers who ferved under him, were brought prisoners to the captital [Dec. 4], in consequence of the orders which Montezuma

B. Diaz. c. 95. Gomara, Cron. c. 83. Cortes, Relat. Ram. iii. p. 235, 236. Herrera, dec. 2. iib. viii. c. 2, 3.

d See Note CX.

had iffued. The emperor gave them up to Cortes, that he might inquire into the nature of their crime, and determine their punishment. They were formally tried by a Spanish courtmartial; and though they had acted no other part than what became loyal subjects and brave men, in obeying the orders of their lawful sovereign, and in opposing the invaders of their country, they were condemned to be burnt alive.

The execution of fuch atrocious deeds is feldom long suspended. The unhappy victims were instantly led forth. The pile on which they were laid was composed of the weapons collected in the royal magazine for the public defence. An innumerable multitude of Mexicans beheld, in silent astonishment, the double insult offered to the majesty of their empire, an officer of distinction committed to the slames by the authority of strangers, for having done what he owed in duty to his natural sovereign; and the arms provided by the foresight of their ancestors for avenging public wrongs, consumed before their eyes.

But these were not the most shocking indignities which the Mexicans had to bear. The Spaniards, convinced that Qualpopoca would not have ventured to attack Escalante without orders from his master, were not satisfied with insticting vengeance on the instrument employed in committing that crime, while the author of it escaped with impunity. Just before Qualpopoca was led out to suffer, Cortes entered the apartment of Montezuma, followed by some of his officers, and a soldier carrying a pair of setters; and approaching the monarch with a stern countenance, told him, that as the persons who were now to undergo the punishment which they merited, had charged him as the cause of the outrage committed, it was necessary that he likewise should make atonement for that guilt; then turning away abruptly, without waiting for a reply, commanded the foldier to clap the fetters on his legs. The orders were inflantly The difconsolate monarch, trained executed. up with an idea that his person was facred and inviolable, and confidering this profanation of it as the prelude of immediate death, broke out into loud lamentations and complaints. His attendants, speechless with horror, fell at his feet, bathing them with their tears; and bearing up the fetters in their hands, endeavoured with officious tenderness to lighten their pressure. Nor did their grief and despondency abate, until Cortes returned from the execution, and with a cheerful countenance ordered the fetters to be taken off. As Montezuma's spirits had funk with unmanly dejection, they now rose into indecent joy; and with an unbecoming transition, he passed at once from the anguish of despair to transports of gratitude and expressions of fondness towards his deliverer.

counte-

In those transactions, as represented by the Spanish historians, we fearch in vain for the qualities which distinguish other parts of Cortes's conduct. To usurp a jurisdiction which could not belong to a stranger, who assumed no higher character than that of an ambassador from a foreign prince, and, under colour of it, to inflict a capital punishment on men whose conduct entitled them to esteem, appears an act of barbarous VOL. II.

Transmitted

barous cruelty. To put the monarch of a great kingdom in irons, and, after fuch ignominious treatment, fuddenly to release him, seems to be a display of power no less inconsiderate than wanton. According to the common relation, no account can be given either of the one action or the other, but that Cortes, intoxicated with fuccess, and prefuming on the ascendant which he had acquired over the minds of the Mexicans, thought nothing too bold for him to undertake, or too dangerous to execute. But, in one view, these proceedings, however repugnant to justice and humanity, may have flowed from that artful policy which regulated every part of Cortes's behaviour towards the Mexicans. They had conceived the Spaniards to be an order of beings superior to men. It was of the utmost consequence to cherish this illusion, and to keep up the veneration which it inspired. Cortes wished that shedding the blood of a Spaniard should be deemed the most heinous of all crimes; and nothing appeared better calculated to establish this opinion, than to condemn the first Mexicans who had ventured to commit it to a cruel death, and to oblige their monarch himself to submit to a mortifying indignity, as an expiation for being acceffary to a deed fo atrocious e.

1520.] The rigour with which Cortes punished the unhappy persons who first prefumed to lay violent hands upon his followers, seems accordingly to have made all the impression that he desired. The spirit of Montezuma was not only overawed, but subdued.

During fix months that Cortes remained in Mexico, the monarch continued in the Spanish quarters, with an appearance of as entire satisfaction and tranquillity, as if he had resided there, not from constraint, but through choice. His ministers and officers attended him as usual. He took cognizance of all affairs; every order was iffued in his name. The external afpect of government appearing the fame, and all its ancient forms being fcrupuloufly observed, the people were so little fensible of any change, that they obeyed the mandates of their monarch with the fame fubmiffive reverence as ever. Such was the dread which both Montezuma and his subjects had of the Spaniards, or fuch the veneration in which they held them, that no attempt was made, to deliver their fovereign from confinement; and though Cortes, relying on this ascendant which he had acquired over their minds, permitted him not only to visit his temples, but to make hunting excursions beyond the lake, a guard of a few Spaniards carried with it such a terror as to intimidate the multitude, and secure the captive monarch f.

Thus, by the fortunate temerity of Cortes in feizing Montezuma, the Spaniards at once fecured to themselves more extensive authority in the Mexican empire than it was possible to have. acquired in a long course of time by open force; and they exercised more absolute sway in the name of another than they could have done in their own. The arts of polished nations, in subjecting such as are less improved, have been nearly the same in every period. The system of screening a foreign usurpation, under the sanction of authority derived from the natural rulers of a country, the device of employing the magistrates and forms already established as instruments to introduce a new dominion, of which we are apt to boast as sublime refinements in policy peculiar to the present age, were inventions of a more early period, and had been tried with success in the West, long before they were practifed in the East.

f Cortes, Relat. p. 236. E. B. Diaz. . 97, 98, 99.

Cortes availed himself to the utmost of the power which he possessed by being able to act in the name of Montezuma. He sent some Spaniards, whom he judged best qualified for such commissions, into different parts of the empire, accompanied by persons of distinction, whom Montezuma appointed to attend them both as guides and protectors. They visited most of the provinces, viewed their soil and productions, surveyed with particular care the districts which yielded gold or silver, pitched upon several places as proper stations for suture colonies, and endeavoured to prepare the minds of the people for submitting to the Spanish yoke. While they were thus employed, Cortes, in the name and by the authority of Montezuma, degraded some of the principal officers in the empire, whose abilities or independent spirit excited his jealousy, and substituted in their place persons less capable or more obsequious.

persons less capable or more obsequious.

One thing still was wanting to complete his security. He wished to have such command of the lake as might insure a retreat, if, either from levity or disgust, the Mexicans should take arms against him, and break down the bridges or cause-

causeways. This, too, his own address, and the facility of Montezuma, enabled him to accomplish. Having frequently entertained his prisoner with pompous accounts of the European marine and art of navigation, he awakened his curiofity to fee those moving palaces which made their way through the water without oars. Under pretext of gratifying this defire, Cortes perfuaded Montezuma to appoint some of his subjects to fetch part of the naval stores which the Spaniards had deposited at Vera Cruz to Mexico, and to employ others in cutting down and preparing timber. With their affiftance, the Spanish carpenters foon completed two brigantines, which afforded a frivolous amusement to the monarch, and were confidered by Cortes as a certain resource, if he should be obliged to retire.

Encouraged by so many instances of the monarch's tame submission to his will, Cortes ventured to put it to a proof still more trying. He urged Montezuma to acknowledge himself a vassal of the king of Castile, to hold his crown of him as superior, and to subject his dominions to the payment of an annual tribute. With this requisition, the last and most humbling that can be made to one possessed of sovereign authority, Montezuma was fo obsequious as to comply. He called together the chief men of his empire, and in a folemn harangue, reminding them of the traditions and prophecies which led them to expect the arrival of a people fprung from the fame stock with themselves, in order to take possession of the supreme power, he declared his belief that the Spaniards were this promised race; that therefore he recognized the right of their monarch to govern the Mexican empire; that he would lay his crown at his feet, and obey him as a tributary. When uttering these words, Montezuma discovered how deeply he was affected in making such a facrifice. Tears and groans frequently interrupted his discourse. Overawed and broken as his spirit was, it still retained fuch a fense of dignity, as to feel that pang which pierces the heart of princes when constrained to refign independent power. The first mention of such a resolution struck the asfembly dumb with aftonishment. This was fol-lowed by a fullen murmur of forrow, mingled with indignation, which indicated some violent eruption of rage to be near at hand. This Cortes foresaw, and seasonably interposed to prevent it, by declaring that his master had no intention to deprive Montezuma of the royal dignity, or to make any innovation upon the constitution and laws of the Mexican empire. This affurance, added to their dread of the Spanish power, and to the authority of their monarch's example, extorted a reluctant confent from the affembly g. The act of submission and homage was executed with all the formalities which the Spaniards were pleased to prescribe h.

Montezuma, at the desire of Cortes, accom-

Montezuma, at the defire of Cortes, accompanied this profession of fealty and homage with a magnificent present to his new sovereign; and, after his example, his subjects brought in very liberal contributions. The Spaniards now collected all the treasure which had been either voluntarily bestowed upon them at different times by Montezuma, or had been extorted from his people under various pretexts; and having melted the gold and filver, the value of these, without including jewels and ornaments of various kinds, which were preserved on account of their curious workmanship, amounted to six hundred thousand pesos. The soldiers were impatient to have it divided, and Cortes complied with their desire. A fifth of the whole was first fet apart as the tax due to the king. Another fifth was allotted to Cortes, as commander in chief. The fums advanced by Velasquez, by Cortes, and by some of the officers, towards defraying the expence of fitting out the armament, were then deducted. The remainder was divided among the army, including the garrison of Vera Cruz, in proportion to their different ranks. After so many defalcations, the share of a private man did not exceed a hundred pelos. This sum fell so far below their fanguine expectations, that some soldiers rejected it with scorn, and others murmured so loudly at this cruel disappointment of their hopes, that it required all the address of Cortes, and no small exertion of his liberality, to appeale them. The complaints of the army were not altogether destitute of foundation. As the crown had contributed nothing towards the equipment or fuccess of the armament, it was not without regret that the foldiers beheld it fweep away fo great a proportion of the treasure purchased by their blood and toil. What fell to the share of the general appeared, according to the ideas of wealth in the fixteenth century, an enormous fum, Some of Cortes's favourites had fecretly appropriated to their own use several ornaments of gold, which neither paid the royal fifth, nor were brought into account as part of the common flock. It was, however, so manifestly the interest of Cortes at this period to make a large remittance to the king, that it is highly probable those concealments were not of great confequence.

B See Note CXII. h Cortes, Relat. 238. D.
B. Diaz. c. 101. Gomara, Cron. c. 92. Herrera, dec. 2.
Nb. x. c. 4.

The total fum amassed by the Spaniards bears no proportion to the ideas which might be formed, either by reflecting on the descriptions given by historians of the ancient splendour of Mexico, or by confidering the productions of its mines in modern times. But, among the ancient Mexicans, gold and filver were not the standards by which the worth of other commodities was estimated; and destitute of the artificial value derived from this circumstance, were no farther in request than as they furnished materials for ornaments and trinkets. These were either confecrated to the gods in their temples, or were worn as marks of distinction by their princes and fome of their most eminent chiefs. As the confumption of the precious metals was inconsiderable, the demand for them was not such as to put either the ingenuity or industry of the Mexicans on the stretch, in order to augment their store. They were altogether unacquainted with the art of working the rich mines with which their country abounded. What gold they had was gathered in the beds of rivers, native, and ripened 1,2 ripened into a pure metallic state i. The utmost effort of their labour in fearch of it was to walh the earth carried down by torrents from the mountains, and to pick out the grains of gold which subsided; and even this simple operation, according to the report of the persons whom Cortes appointed to survey the provinces where there was a prospect of finding mines, they per-formed very unskilfully k. From all those causes, the whole mass of gold in possession of the Mexicans was not great. As silver is rarely found pure, and the Mexican art was too rude to conduct the process for refining it in a proper manner, the quantity of this metal was still less considerable. Thus, though the Spaniards had exerted all the power which they possessed in Mexico, and often with indecent rapacity, in. order to gratify their predominant passion, and though Montezuma had fondly exhausted his treasures, in hopes of satisting their thirst for gold, the product of both, which probably included a great part of the bullion in the empire, did not rife in value above what has been mentioned m.

But however pliant Montezuma might be in other matters, with respect to one point he was inflexible. Though Cortes often urged him, with the importunate zeal of a missionary, to renounce his false gods, and to embrace the Christian faith, he always rejected the proposition with horror. Superstition, among the Mexicans, was formed into such a regular and complete

i Cortes, Relat. p. 236. F. B. Diaz. c. 102, 103. Go-mara, Cron. c. 90 k B. Diaz. c. 103.

Herrera, dec. 2. lib. ix. c. 4.

M See NOTE CXIII.

fystem, that its institutions naturally took fast hold of the mind; and while the rude tribes in other parts of America were eafily induced to relinquish a few notions and rites, so loose and arbitrary as hardly to merit the name of a public religion, the Mexicans adhered tenaciously to their mode of worship, which, however barbarous, was accompanied with fuch order and folemnity as to render it an object of the highest veneration. Cortes, finding all his attempts ineffectual to shake the constancy of Montezuma, was fo much enraged at his obstinacy, that in a transport of zeal he led out his soldiers to throw down the idols in the great temple by force. But the priests taking arms in defence of their altars, and the people crowding with great ardour to support them, Cortes's prudence overruled his zeal, and induced him to design from his rash attempt, after dislodging the idols. from one of the shrines, and placing in their flead an image of the Virgin Mary ".

From that moment the Mexicans, who had permitted the imprisonment of their fovereign, and suffered the exactions of strangers without a struggle, began to meditate how they might expel or destroy the Spaniards, and thought themselves called upon to avenge their insulted deities. The priests and leading men held frequent consultations with Montezuma for this purpose. But as it might prove fatal to the captive monarch to attempt either the one or the other by violence, he was willing to try more gentle means. Having called Cortes into his presence, he observed, that now, as all the purposes of his embassy were fully accomplished, the gods had declared their will, and the people fignified their defire that he and his followers should instantly depart out of the empire. With this he required them to comply, or unavoidable destruction would fall suddenly on their heads. The tenor of this unexpected requisition, as well as the determined tone in which it was uttered. left Cortes no room to doubt that it was the refult of some deep scheme concerted between Montezuma and his subjects. He quickly per-ceived that he might derive more advantage from a feeming compliance with the monarch's inclination, than from an ill-timed attempt to change or to oppose it; and replied, with great composure, that he had already begun to prepare for returning to his own country; but as he had destroyed the vessels in which he arrived, some time was requisite for building other ships. This appeared reasonable. A number of Mexicans were sent to Vera Cruz to cut down timber, and some Spanish carpenters were appointed to superintend the work. Cortes flattered himself, that during this interval he might either find means to avert the threatened danger, or receive fuch reinforcements as would enable him to despise it.

Almost nine months were elapsed fince Portocarrero and Montejo had failed with his difpatches to Spain; and he daily expected their return with a confirmation of his authority from the king. Without this, his condition was infecure and precarious, and after all the great things which he had done, it might be his doom to bear the name and fuffer the punish. ment of a traitor. Rapid and extensive as his progress had been, he could not hope to complete the reduction of a great empire with so small a body of men, which by this time diseases of various kinds considerably thinned; nor could he apply for recruits to the Spanish settlements in the islands until he received the royal approbation of his proceedings.

progress

While he remained in this cruel fituation. anxious about what was past, uncertain with respect to the future, and, by the late declaration of Montezuma, oppressed with a new addition of cares, a Mexican courier arrived with an account of some ships having appeared on the coast. Cortes, with fond credulity, imagining that his messengers were returned from Spain, and that the completion of all his wishes and hopes was at hand, imparted the glad tidings to his companions, who received them with transports of mutual gratulation. Their joy was not of long continuance. A courier from Sandoval, whom Cortes had appointed to fucceed Escalante in command at Vera Cruz, brought certain information that the armament was fitted out by Velasquez, governor of Cuba, and instead of bringing the aid which they expected, threatened them with immediate destruction.

The motives which prompted Velasquez to this violent measure are obvious. From the circumstances of Cortes's departure, it was impossible not to suspect his intention of throwing off all dependence upon him. His neglecting to transmit any account of his operations to Cuba, strengthened this suspicion, which was at last confirmed beyond doubt, by the indiscretion of the officers whom Cortes fent to Spain. They, from some motive which is not clearly explained by the contemporary historians, touched at the island of Cuba, contrary to the peremptory orders of their general. By this means Velafquez not only learned that Cortes and his followers, after formally renouncing all connection with him, had established an independent colony in New Spain, and were foliciting the king to confirm their proceedings by his authority; but he obtained particular information concerning the opulence of the country, the valuable prefents which Cortes had received, and the inviting prospects of success that opened to his view. Every passion which can agitate an ambitious mind; shame, at having been to grofsly overreached; indignation, at being betrayed by the man whom he had felected as the object of his favour and confidence; grief, for having wasted his fortune to aggrandize an enemy; and despair of recovering so fair an opportunity of establishing his same and extending his power, now raged in the bosom of Velasquez. All these, with united force, excited him to make an extraordinary effort in order to be avenged on the author of his wrongs, and to wrest from him his usurped authority and conquests. Nor did he want the appearance of a good title to justify such an attempt. The agent whom he fent to Spain with an account of Grijalva's voyage, had met with a most favourable reception; and from the specimens which he produced, fuch high expectations were formed VOL. II.

o B. Diaz. c. 54, 55. Herrera, dec. 2, lib. v. c. 14. Gomara Cron. c. 96.

formed concerning the opulence of New Spain, that Velasquez was authorised to prosecute the discovery of the country, and appointed governor of it during life, with more extensive power and privileges than had been granted to any adventurer from the time of Columbus q. Elated by this distinguishing mark of favour, and warranted to consider Cortes not only as intruding upon his jurisdiction, but as disobedient to the royal mandate, he determined to vindicate his own rights and the honour of his fovereign by force of arms. His ardour in carrying on his preparations, was such as might have been expected from the violence of the passions with which he was animated; and in a short time an armament was completed, confisting of eighteen ships, which had on board fourfcore horsemen, eight hundred foot foldiers, of which eighty were musketeers, and an hundred and twenty cross-bow men, together with a train of twelve pieces of cannon. As Velasquez's experience of the fatal consequence of committing to another what he ought to have executed himself, had not rendered him more enterprising, he vested the command of this formidable body, which, in the infancy of the Spanish power in America, merits the appellation of an army, in Pamphilo de Narvaez, with instructions to seize Cortes and his principal officers, to send them prisoners to him, and then to complete the discovery and conquest of the country in his name.

After a prosperous voyage, Narvaez landed his men without opposition near St. Juan de

⁹ Herrera, dec. 2. lib. iii. c. 11.
F See NOTE CXV.

Ullua [April]. Three foldiers, whom Cortes had fent to fearch for mines in that district, immediately joined him. By this accident, he not only received information concerning the progress and fituation of Cortes, but as these soldiers had made some progress in the knowledge of the Mexican language, he acquired interpreters, by whose means he was enabled to hold some intercourse with the people of the country. But, according to the low cunning of deferters, they framed their intelligence with more attention to what they thought would be agreeable, than to what they knew to be true; and represented the fituation of Cortes to be fo desperate, and the disaffection of his followers to be so general, as increased the natural confidence and prefumption of Narvaez. His first operation, however, might have taught him not to rely on their partial accounts. Having fent to fummon the governor of Vera Cruz to furrender, Guevara, a priest whom he employed in that fervice, made the requisition with such insolence; that Sandoval, an officer of high spirit, and zealously attached to Cortes, instead of complying with his demands, seized him and his attendants, and sent them in chains to Mexico.

Cortes received them not like enemies, but as friends, and condemning the feverity of Sandoval, fet them immediately at liberty. By this well-timed clemency, feconded by careffes and prefents, he gained their confidence, and drew from them fuch particulars concerning the force and intentions of Narvaez, as gave him a view of the impending danger in its full extent. He had not to contend now with half-naked Indians, no match for him in war, and still more inferior in the arts of policy, but to take the field against an army in courage and martial discipline equal to his own, in number far superior, acting under the fanction of royal authority, and commanded by an officer of known bravery. He was informed that Narvaez, more folicitous to gratify the refentment of Velasquez, than attentive to the honour or interest of his country, had begun his intercourse with the natives, by representing him and his followers as fugitives and outlaws, guilty of rebellion against their own fovereign, and of injustice in invading the Mexican empire; and had declared that his chief object in visiting the country was to punish the Spaniards who had committed these crimes, and to refcue the Mexicans from oppression. He soon perceived that the same un-favourable representations of his character and actions had been conveyed to Montezuma, and that Narvaez had found means to affure him, that as the conduct of those who kept him under restraint was highly displeasing to the king his master, he had it in charge not only to rescue an injured monarch from confinement, but to reinstate him in the possession of his ancient power and independence. Animated with this prospect of being set free from subjection to thrangers, the Mexicans in several provinces began openly to revolt from Cortes, and to regard Narvaez as a deliverer no less able than willing to fave them. Montezuma himself kept up a fecret intercourse with the new commander, and feemed to court him as a person superior in power power and dignity to those Spaniards whom he had hitherto revered as the first of men s.

had

Such were the various aspects of danger and difficulty which presented themselves to the view of Cortes. No fituation can be conceived more trying to the capacity and firmness of a general, or where the choice of the plan which ought to be adopted was more difficult. If he should wait the approach of Narvaez in Mexico, destruction seemed to be unavoidable; for while the Spaniards pressed him from without, the inhabitants, whose turbulent spirit he could hardly restrain with all his authority and attention, would eagerly lay hold on fuch a favourable opportunity of avenging all their wrongs. If he should abandon the capital, set the captive monarch at liberty, and march out to meet the enemy, he must at once forego the fruits of all his toils and victories, and relinquish advantages which could not be recovered without extraordinary efforts, and infinite danger. If, instead of employing force, he should have recourse to conciliating measures, and attempt an accommodation with Narvaez; the natural haughtiness of that officer, augmented by consciousness of his present superiority, forbad him to cherish any sanguine hope of fuccess. After revolving every scheme with deep attention, Cortes fixed upon that which in execution was most hazardous, but, if successful, would prove most beneficial to himself and to his country; and with the decifive intrepidity fuited to desperate situations, determined to make one bold effort for victory under every difadvantage, rather than facrifice bis own conquests and the Spanish interest in Mexico.

> See NOTE CXVI. S 3

:11

But though he forefaw that the contest must be terminated finally by arms, it would have been not only indecent but criminal, to have marched against his countrymen, without attempting to adjust matters by an amicable negociation. In this fervice he employed Olmedo, his chaplain, to whose character the function was well suited, and who possessed, besides, such prudence and address as qualified him to carry on the secret intrigues in which Cortes placed his chief confidence. Narvaez rejected, with fcorn, every scheme of accommodation that Olmedo proposed, and was with difficulty rethrained from laying violent hands on him and his attendants. He met, however, with a more favourable reception among the followers of Narvaez, to many of whom he delivered letters, either from Cortes or his officers, their ancient friends and companions. Cortes artfully accompanied these with presents of rings, chains of gold, and other trinkets of value, which inspired those needy adventurers with high ideas of the wealth that he had acquired, and with envy of their good fortune who were engaged in his service. Some, from hopes of becoming sharers in those rich spoils, declared for an immediate accommodation with Cortes. Others, from public spirit, laboured to prevent a civil war, which, whatever party should prevail, must shake, and perhaps subvert the Spanish power, in a country where it was so imperfectly established. Narvaez difregarded both, and by a public proclamation denounced Cortes and his adherents adherents rebels and enemies to their country. Cortes, it is probable, was not much furprifed at the untractable arrogance of Narvaez; and, after having given fuch a proof of his own pacific disposition as might justify his recourse to other means, he determined to advance towards an enemy whom he had laboured in vain to appeafe.

He left a hundred and fifty men in the capital [May], under the command of Pedro de Alvarado, an officer of distinguished courage, for whom the Mexicans had conceived a fingular degree of respect. To the custody of this slender garrison he committed a great city, with all the wealth he had amassed, and, what was still of greater importance, the person of the imprisoned monarch. His utmost art was employed in concealing from Montezuma the real cause of his march. He laboured to perfuade him, that the strangers who had lately arrived were his friends and fellow-subjects; and that, after a short interview with them, they would depart together, and return to their own country. The captive prince, unable to comprehend the defigns of the Spaniards, or to reconcile what he now heard with the declarations of Narvaez, and afraid to discover any fymptom of suspicion or distrust of Cortes, promifed to remain quietly in the Spanish quarters, and to cultivate the same friendship with Alvarado which he had uniformly maintained with him. Cortes, with feeming confidence in this promife, but relying principally upon the injunctions which he had given Alvarado to guard his prisoner with the most scrupulous vigilance, fet out from Mexico.

His strength, even after it was reinforced by the junction of Sandoval and the garrison of Vera Cruz, did not exceed two hundred and sifty men. As he hoped for success chiesly from the rapidity of his motions, his troops were not incumbered either with baggage or artillery. But as he dreaded extremely the impression which the enemy might make with their cavalry, he had provided against this danger with the foresight and sagacity which distinguish a great commander. Having observed that the Indians in the province of Chinantla used spears of extraordinary length and force, he armed his soldiers with these, and accustomed them to that deep and compact arrangement which the use of this formidable weapon, the best perhaps that ever was invented for defence, enabled them to assume

With this small but firm battalion, Cortes advanced towards Zempoalla, of which Narvaez had taken possession. During his march, he made repeated attempts towards some accommodation with his opponent. But Narvaez requiring that Cortes and his followers should instantly recognize his title to be governor of New Spain, in virtue of the powers which he derived from Velasquez; and Cortes resusing to submit to any authority which was not sounded on a commission from the emperor himself, under whose immediate protection he and his adherents had placed their infant colony; all these attempts proved fruitless. The intercourse, however, which this occasioned between the two parties, proved of no small advantage to Cortes, as it afforded him an opportunity of gaining some of Narvaez's officers by liberal presents, of softening others by a femblance of moderation, and of dazzling all by the appearance of wealth among his troops, most of his foldiers having converted their share of the Mexican gold into chains, bracelets, and other ornaments, which they difplayed with military oftentation. Narvaez and a little junto of his creatures excepted, all the army leaned towards an accommodation with their countrymen. This discovery of their inclination irritated his violent temper almost to madness. In a transport of rage, he set a price upon the head of Cortes, and of his principal officers; and having learned that he was now advanced within a league of Zempoalla with his fmall body of men, he confidered this as an infult which merited immediate chastisement, and marched out with all his troops to offer him battle.

But Cortes was a leader of greater abilities and experience than, on equal ground, to fight an enemy fo far superior in number, and so much better appointed. Having taken his station on the opposite bank of the river de Canoas, where he knew that he could not be attacked, he beheld the approach of the enemy without concern, and difregarded this vain bravade. It was then the beginning of the wet feafon t, and the rain had poured down, during a great part of the day, with the violence peculiar to the torrid zone. The followers of Narvaez, unaccustomed to the hardships of military service, murmured fo much at being thus fruitlefsly exposed, that, from their unfoldier-like impatience, ^{*} Hackluyt, vol. iii. 467. De Laet, Descr. Ind. Occid. 221.

as well as his own contempt of his adverfary, their general permitted them to retire to Zempoalla. The very circumstance which induced them to quit the field, encouraged Cortes to form a scheme, by which he hoped at once to terminate the war. He observed, that his hardy veterans, though standing under the torrents, which continued to fall, without a single tent or any shelter whatsoever to cover them, were so far from repining at hardships which were be-come familiar to them, that they were still fresh and alert for service. He foresaw that the enemy would naturally give themselves up to repose after their fatigue, and that, judging of the conduct of others by their own effeminacy, they would deem themselves perfectly secure at a seafon fo unfit for action. He refolved, therefore, to fall upon them in the dead of night, when the furprise and terror of this unexpected attack might more than compensate the inferiority of his numbers. His foldiers, sensible that no refource remained but in fome desperate effort of courage, approved of the measure with such warmth, that Cortes, in a military oration which he addressed to them before they began their march, was more folicitous to temper than to inflame their ardour. He divided them into three parties. At the head of the first he placed Sandoval; entrusting this gallant officer with the most dangerous and important service, that of seizing the enemy's artillery, which was planted before the principal tower of the temple, where Narvaez had fixed his head-quarters. Christoval de Olid commanded the fecond, with orders to affault the MER STAD ON MER LYDE tower, and lay hold on the general. Cortes himself conducted the third and smallest division, which was to act as a body of referve, and to support the other two as there should be occasion. Having passed the river de Canoas, which was much swelled with the rains, not without difficulty, the water reaching almost to their chins, they advanced in profound filence, without beat of drum, or found of any warlike instrument; each man armed with his sword, his dagger, and his Chinantlan spear. Narvaez, remiss in proportion to his security, had posted only two centinels to watch the motions of an enemy whom he had fuch good cause to dread. One of these was seized by the advanced guard of Cortes's troops, the other made his escape, and hurrying to the town with all the precipitation of fear and zeal, gave fuch timely notice of the enemy's approach, that there was full leifure to have prepared for their reception. But, through the arrogance and infatuation of Narvaez, this important interval was loft. He imputed this alarm to the cowardice of the centinel, and treated with derision the idea of being attacked by forces so unequal to his own. The shouts of Cortes's foldiers, rushing on to the affault, convinced him at last, that the danger which he despised was real. The rapidity with which they advanced was such, that only one cannon could be fired, before Sandoval's party closed with the enemy, drove them from their guns, and began to force their way up the steps of the tower. Narvaez, no less brave in action than presumptuous in conduct, armed himself in haste, and by his voice and example animated his men to the combat. Olid advanced to fultain tain his companions; and Cortes himself, rushing to the front, conducted and added new vigour to the attack. The compact order in which this fmall body pressed on, and the im-penetrable front which they presented with their long spears, bore down all opposition before it. They had now reached the gate, and were struggling to burst it open, when a soldier having set fire to the reeds with which the tower was covered, compelled Narvaez to fally out. In the first encounter he was wounded in the eye with a spear, and falling to the ground, was dragged down the steps, and in a moment clapt in fetters. The cry of victory resounded among the troops of Cortes. Those who had fallied out with their leader now maintained the conflict feebly, and began to furrender. Among the remainder of his foldiers, stationed in two fmaller towers of the temple, terror and confufion prevailed. The darkness was so great, that, they could not distinguish between their friends and foes. Their own artillery was pointed against them. Wherever they turned their eyes, they beheld lights gleaming through the obscurity of night, which, though proceeding only from a variety of shining infects, that abound in moist and sultry climates, their efficients of significant in their efficients. and fultry climates, their affrighted imaginations represented as numerous bands of musketeers advancing with kindled matches to the attack. After a short resistance, the soldiers compelled their officers to capitulate, and before morning all laid down their arms, and submitted quietly to their conquerors.

100

This complete victory proved more acceptable, as it was gained almost without bloodshed, only two soldiers being killed on the side of Cortes, and two officers, with fifteen private men, of the adverse faction. Cortes treated the vanquished not like enemies, but as countrymen and friends, and offered either to fend them directly to Cuba, or to take them into his fervice, as partners in his fortune, on equal terms with his own foldiers. This latter proposition, seconded by a seasonable distribution of some presents from Cortes, and liberal promises of more, opened profpects fo agreeable to the romantic expectations which had invited them to engage in this fervice, that all, a few partizans of Narvaez excepted, closed with it, and vied with each other in professions of sidelity and attachment to a general whose recent success had given them such a striking proof of his abilities for command. Thus, by a series of events no less fortunate than uncommon, Cortes not only escaped from per-dition which seemed inevitable, but, when he had least reason to expect it, was placed at the head of a thousand Spaniards, ready to follow wherever he should lead them. Whoever reflects upon the facility with which this victory was obtained, or confiders with what fudden and unanimous transition the followers of Narvaez ranged themfelves under the standard of his rival, will be apt to ascribe both events as much to the intrigues as to the arms of Cortes, and cannot but suspect that the ruin of Narvaez was occasioned, no less by the treachery of his own followers, than by the valour of his enemy u.

But, in one point, the prudent conduct and good fortune of Cortes were equally conspicuous.

u Cortes, Relat. 242. D. B. Diaz. c. 110-125. Her-rera, dec. 2. lib. ix. c. 18, &c. Gomara, Cron. c. 97, &c. VOL. II.

If, by the rapidity of his operations after he began his march, he had not brought matters to fuch a fpeedy iffue, even this decifive victory would have come too late to have faved his companions whom he left in Mexico. A few days after the discomsiture of Narvaez, a courier arrived with an account that the Mexicans had taken arms, and having feized and destroyed the two brigantines, which Cortes had built in order to fecure the command of the lake, and attacked the Spaniards in their quarters, had killed feveral of them, and wounded more, had reduced to ashes their magazine of provisions, and carried on hostilities with such fury, that, though Alvarado and his men defended themselves with undaunted resolution, they must either be foon cut off by famine, or fink under the multitude of their enemies. This revolt was excited by motives which rendered it still more alarming. On the departure of Cortes for Zempoalla, the Mexicans flattered themselves, that the longexpected opportunity of restoring their sovereign to liberty, and of vindicating their country from the odious dominion of strangers, was at length arrived; that while the forces of their oppressors were divided, and the arms of one party turned against the other, they might triumph with greater facility over both. Confultations were held, and schemes formed with this intention. The Spaniards in Mexico, conscious of their own feebleness, suspected and dreaded those machinations. Alvarado, though a gallant officer, possessed neither that extent of capacity, nor dignity of manners, by which Cortes had acquired fuch an afcendant over the minds of the Mexicans, cans, as never allowed them to form a just estimate of his weakness or of their own strength. Alvarado knew no mode of supporting his authority but force. Instead of employing address to disconcert the plans or to footh the spirits of the Mexicans, he waited the return of one of their solemn festivals, when the principal persons in the empire were dancing, according to custom, in the court of the great temple; he feized all the avenues which led to it, and, allured partly by the rich ornaments which they wore in honour of their gods, and partly by the facility of cutting off at once the authors of that conspiracy which he dreaded, he fell upon them, unarmed and unsufpicious of any danger, and massacred a great number, none escaping but such as made their way over the battlements of the temple. An action fo cruel and treacherous filled not only the city, but the whole empire, with indignation and rage. All called aloud for vengeance; and regardless of the safety of their monarch, whose life was at the mercy of the Spaniards, or of their own danger in affaulting an enemy who had been fo long the object of their terror, they committed all those acts of violence of which Cortes received an account.

To him the danger appeared so imminent, as to admit neither of deliberation nor delay. He set out instantly with all his forces, and returned from Zempoalla with no less rapidity than he had advanced thither. At Tlascala he was joined by two thousand chosen warriors. On entering the Mexican territories he found that disaffection to the Spaniards was not confined to the capital. The principal inhabitants had de-ferted the towns through which he passed; no person of note appearing to meet him with the usual respect; no provision was made for the subsistence of his troops; and though he was permitted to advance without opposition, the folitude and filence which reigned in every place, and the horror with which the people avoided all intercourse with him, discovered a deep-rooted antipathy, that excited the most just alarm. But, implacable as the enmity of the Mexicans was, they were so unacquainted with the science of war, that they knew not how to take the proper measures, either for their own safety or the destruction of the Spaniards. Uninstructed by their former error in admitting a formidable enemy into their capital, instead of breaking down the causeways and bridges, by which they might have inclosed Alvarado and his party, and have effectually stopt the career of Cortes, they again suffered him to march into the city [June 24] without molestation, and to take quiet possession of his ancient station.

The transports of joy with which Alvarado and his soldiers received their companions cannot be expressed. Both parties were so much elated, the one with their seasonable deliverance, and the other with the great exploits which they had atchieved, that this intoxication of success seems to have reached Cortes himself; and he behaved on this occasion neither with his usual sagacity nor attention. He not only neglected to visit Montezuma, but imbittered the insult by expressions sull of contempt for that unfortunate prince and his people. The forces of which he had now the command, appeared to him so irressistible fiftible, that he might affume an higher tone, and lay afide the mask of moderation under which he had hitherto concealed his designs. Some Mexicans, who understood the Spanish language, heard the contemptuous words which Cortes uttered, and reporting them to their countrymen, kindled their rage anew. They were now convinced that the intentions of the general were equally bloody with those of Alvarado, and that his original purpose in visiting their country, had not been, as he pretended, to court the alliance of their fovereign, but to attempt the conquest of his dominions. They refumed their arms with the additional fury which this discovery inspired, attacked a confiderable body of Spaniards who were marching towards the great square in which the public market was held, and compelled them to retire with fome lofs. Emboldened by this fuccefs, and delighted to find that their oppressors were not invincible, they advanced next day with extraordinary martial pomp to affault the Spaniards in their quarters. Their number was formidable, and their undaunted courage still more fo. Though the artillery pointed against their numerous battalions, crowded together in narrow streets, swept off multitudes at every discharge; though every blow of the Spanish weapons fell with mortal effect upon their naked bodies, the impetuofity of the affault did not abate. Fresh men rushed forward to occupy the places of the slain, and meeting with the same sate, were fucceeded by others no less intrepid and eager for vengeance. The utmost effort of Cortes's abilities and experience, seconded by the disciplined MIL plined valour of his troops, were hardly sufficient to defend the fortifications that surrounded the post where the Spaniards were stationed, into which the enemy were more than once on the point of forcing their way.

Cortes beheld, with wonder, the implacable ferocity of a people who feemed at first to sub-mit tamely to the yoke, and had continued so long passive under it. The soldiers of Narvaez, who fondly imagined that they followed Cortes to share in the spoils of a conquered empire, were altonished to find that they were involved in a dangerous war, with an enemy whose vigour was still unbroken, and loudly execrated their own weakness, in giving such easy credit to the delusive promises of their new leader x. But furprise and complaints were of no avail. Some immediate and extraordinary effort was requifite to extricate themselves out of their prefent situation. As soon as the approach of evening induced the Mexicans to retire, in compliance with their national custom of ceasing from hostilities with the setting fun, Cortes began to prepare for a fally, next day, with fuch a considerable force, as might either drive the enemy out of the city, or compel them to liften to terms of accommodation.

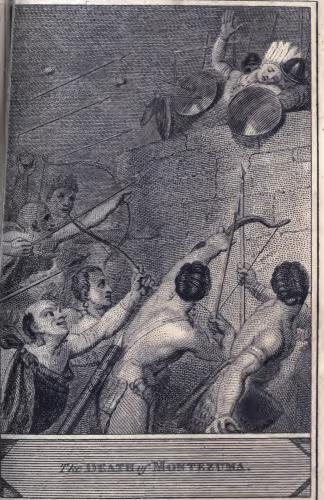

He conducted, in person, the troops destined for this important service. Every invention known in the European art of war, as well as every precaution, suggested by his long acquaint, ance with the Indian mode of fighting, were employed to ensure success. But he found an enemy prepared and determined to oppose him.

dr c

The force of the Mexicans was greatly augmented by fresh troops, which poured in continually from the country, and their animofity was in no degree abated. They were led by their nobles, inflamed by the exhortations of their priefts, and fought in defence of their temples and families, under the eye of their gods, and in presence of their wives and children. Notwithstanding their numbers, and enthusiastic contempt of danger and death, wherever the Spaniards could close with them, the superiority of their discipline and arms obliged the Mexicans to give way. But in narrow streets, and where many of the bridges of communication were broken down, the Spaniards could feldom come to a fair rencounter with the enemy, and as they advanced, were exposed to showers of arrows and stones from the tops of houses. After a day of incessant exertion, though vast numbers of the Mexicans fell, and part of the city was burnt, the Spaniards, weary with the flaughter, and haraffed by multitudes which fuccessively relieved each other, were obliged at length to retire, with the mortification of having accomplished nothing so decisive as to compensate the unufual calamity of having twelve foldiers killed, and above fixty wounded. Another fally, made with greater force, was not more effectual, and in it the general himself was wounded in the hand.

Cortes now perceived, too late, the fatal error into which he had been betrayed by his own contempt of the Mexicans, and was fatisfied that he could neither maintain his present station in the centre of an hostile city, nor retire from it without the most imminent danger. One refource still remained, to try what effect the in-terposition of Montezuma might have to soothe or overawe his subjects. When the Mexicans approached next morning to renew the assault, that unfortunate prince, at the mercy of the Spaniards, and reduced to the fad necessity of becoming the instrument of his own difgrace, and of the flavery of his people y, advanced to the battlements in his royal robes, and with all the pomp in which he used to appear on solemn occasions. At fight of their sovereign, whom they had long been accustomed to honour, and almost revere as a god, the weapons dropt from their hands, every tongue was filent, all bowed their heads, and many prostrated themselves on the ground. Montezuma addressed them with every argument that could mitigate their rage, or persuade them to cease from hostilities. When he ended his discourse, a sullen murmur of disapprobation run through the ranks; to this succeeded reproaches and threats; and the fury of the multitude rifing in a moment above every restraint of decency or respect, slights of arrows and volleys of stones poured in so violently upon the ramparts, that before the Spanish foldiers, appointed to cover Montezuma with their buck-lers, had time to lift them in his defence, two arrows wounded the unhappy monarch, and the blow of a stone on his temple struck him to the ground. On feeing him fall, the Mexicans were so much astonished, that, with a transition not uncommon in popular tumults, they passed in a moment from one extreme to the other, remorfe

Stothard R.A.del

Rothwell sculp

Published Peb'n 1801, by Cadell & Davies, Strand.

10 7111

fucceeded to infult, and they fled with horror, as if the vengeance of Heaven were pursuing the crime which they had committed. The Spaniards, without moleftation, carried Montezuma to his apartments, and Cortes hastened thither to confole him under his misfortune. But the unhappy monarch now perceived how low he was funk, and the haughty fpirit which feemed to have been fo long extinct, returning, he fcorned to survive this last humiliation, and to protract an ignominious life, not only as the prisoner and tool of his enemies, but as the object of contempt or detestation among his subjects. In a transport of rage he tore the bandages from his wounds, and refused, with such obstinacy, to take any nourishment, that he soon ended his wretched days, rejecting with difdain all the folicitations of the Spaniards to embrace the Christian faith.

Upon the death of Montezuma, Cortes having lost all hope of bringing the Mexicans to an accommodation, saw no prospect of safety but in attempting a retreat, and began to prepare for it. But a sudden motion of the Mexicans engaged him in new conflicts. They took possession of a high tower in the great temple which overlooked the Spanish quarters, and placing there a garrison of their principal warriors, not a Spaniard could stir without being exposed to their missile weapons. From this post it was necessary to dislodge them at any risk; and Juan de Escobar, with a numerous detachment of chosen soldiers, was ordered to make the attack. But Escobar, though a gallant officer, and at the head of troops accustomed to conquer, and who now fought under the eyes of their countrymen, was thrice repulsed. Cortes, sensible that not only the reputation, but the fafety of his army depended on the fuccess of this assault, ordered a buckler to be tied to his arm, as he could not manage it with his wounded hand, and rushed with his drawn fword into the thickest of the combatants. Encouraged by the presence of their general, the Spaniards returned to the charge with fuch vigour, that they gradually forced their way up the steps, and drove the Mexicans to the platform at the top of the tower. There a dreadful carnage began, when two young Mexicans of high rank, observing Cortes as he animated his foldiers by his voice and example, refolved to facrifice their own lives in order to cut off the author of all the calamities which defolated their country. They approached him in a supplicant posture, as if they had intended to lay down their arms, and feizing him in a moment, hurried him towards the battlements, over which they threw themselves headlong, in hopes of dragging him along to be dashed in pieces by the same fall. But Cortes, by his strength and agility, broke loose from their grasp, and the gallant youths perished in this generous though unsuccessful attempt to save their country. As soon as the y M. Clavigero has censured me with asperity for relating this gallant action of the two Mexicans, and for supposing that there were battlements round the temple of Mexico. I related the attempt to destroy Cortes on the authority of Herdec. 2. lib. x. c. 9. and of Torquemada, lib. iv. c. 69. I followed them likewise in supposing the uppermost platform of the temple to be encompassed by a battlement or pail.

Spaniards

Spaniards became masters of the tower, they set fire to it, and, without farther moleftation, continued the preparations for their retreat.

This became the more necessary, as the Mexicans were fo much aftonished at the last effort of the Spanish valour, that they began to change their whole fystem of hostility, and, instead of inceffant attacks, endeavoured, by barricading the streets, and breaking down the causeways, to cut off the communication of the Spaniards with the continent, and thus to starve an enemy whom they could not fubdue. The first point to be determined by Cortes and his followers, was, whether they should march out openly in the face of day, when they could discern every danger, and fee how to regulate their own mo-tions, as well as how to refult the affaults of the enemy; or, whether they should endeavour to retire fecretly in the night? The latter was preferred, partly from hopes that their national fuperstition would restrain the Mexicans from venturing to attack them in the night, and partly from their own fond belief in the predictions of a private foldier, who having acquired univerfal credit by a fmattering of learning, and his pretensions to astrology, boldly assured his countrymen of fuccess, if they made their retreat in this manner. They began to move, towards midnight, in three divisions. Sandoval led the van; Pedro Alvarado, and Velasquez de Leon, had the conduct of the rear; and Cortes commanded in the centre, where he placed the prisoners, among whom were a fon and two daughters of Montezuma, together with several Mexicans of distinction, the artillery, the baggage, and a portable portable bridge of timber, intended to be laid over the breaches in the causeway. They marched in profound silence along the causeway which led to Tacuba, because it was shorter than any of the rest, and lying most remote from the road towards Tlascala and the sea-coast, had been lest more entire by the Mexicans. They reached the first breach in it without molestation, hoping that their retreat was undiscovered.

But the Mexicans, unperceived, had not only watched all their motions with attention, but had made proper dispositions for a most formidable attack. While the Spaniards were intent upon placing their bridge in the breach, and oc-cupied in conducting their horses and artillery along it, they were suddenly alarmed with the tremendous found of warlike instruments, and a general shout from an innumerable multitude of enemies; the lake was covered with canoes; flights of arrows and showers of stones poured in upon them from every quarter; the Mexicans rushing forward to the charge with fearless impetuofity, as if they hoped in that moment to be avenged for all their wrongs. Unfortunately the wooden bridge, by the weight of the artillery, was wedged fo fast into the stones and mud, that it was impossible to remove it. Dismayed at this accident, the Spaniards advanced with precipitation towards the fecond breach. The Mexicans hemmed them in on every fide, and though they defended themselves with their usual courage, yet crouded together as they were on a narrow caufeway, their discipline and military skill were of little avail, nor did the obscurity of the night permit them to derive great advantage from from their fire-arms, or the superiority of their other weapons. All Mexico was now in arms, and fo eager were the people on the destruction of their oppressors, that they who were not near enough to annoy them in person, impatient of the delay, pressed forward with such ardour, as drove on their countrymen in the front with irrefistible violence. Fresh warriors instantly filled the place of such as fell. The Spaniards, weary with slaughter, and unable to sustain the weight of the torrent that poured in upon them, began to give way. In a moment the confusion was universal; horse and foot, officers and soldiers, friends and enemies, were mingled together: and while all fought, and many fell, they could hardly diftinguish from what hand the blow came.

Cortes, with about a hundred foot foldiers and a few horse, forced his way over the two remaining breaches in the caufeway, the bodies of the dead ferving to fill up the chasms, and reached the main land. Having formed them as foon as they arrived, he returned with fuch as were yet capable of fervice, to affift his friends in their retreat, and to encourage them, by his presence and example, to persevere in the efforts requisite to effect it. He met with part of his foldiers, who had broke through the enemy, but found many more overwhelmed by the multitude of their aggreffors, or perishing in the lake; and heard the piteous lamentations of others, whom the Mexicans, having taken alive, were carrying off in triumph to be facrificed to thegod of war. Before day, all who had escaped affembled at Tacuba. But when the morning: dawned, · VOL. II.

dawned, and discovered to the view of Cortes his shattered battalion, reduced to less than half its number, the survivors dejected, and most of them covered with wounds, the thoughts of what they had suffered, and the remembrance of so many faithful friends and gallant followers who had fallen in that night of sorrow z, pierced his soul with such anguish, that while he was forming their ranks, and issuing some necessary orders, his soldiers observed the tears trickling from his eyes, and remarked, with much satisfaction, that, while attentive to the duties of a general, he was not insensible to the feelings of a man.

In this fatal retreat many officers of distinction perished a, and among these Velasquez de Leon, who having forfaken the party of his kinfman, the governor of Cuba, to follow the fortune of his companions, was, on that account, as well as for his superior merit, respected by them as the fecond person in the army. All the artillery, ammunition, and baggage, were loft; the greater part of the horses, and above two thousand Tlascalans, were killed, and only a very small portion of the treasure which they had amassed was faved. This, which had been always their chief object, proved a great cause of their calamity; for many of the foldiers having fo overloaded themselves with bars of gold as rendered them unfit for action, and retarded their flight, fell ignominiously the victims of their own inconsiderate avarice. Amidst so many disasters, it was fome confolation to find that Aguilar and Marina, whose function as interpreters was of fuch effential importance, had made their escape b.

Noche Triffe is the name by which it is still distinguished in New Spain. See Note CXVIII.

The first care of Cortes was to find some shelter for his wearied troops; for as the Mexicans infested them on every side, and the people of Tacuba began to take arms, he could not continue in his present station. He directed his march towards the rifing ground, and having fortunately discovered a temple situated on an eminence, took possession of it. There he found not only the shelter for which he wished, but, what was no less wanted, some provisions to refresh his men; and though the enemy did not intermit their attacks throughout the day, they were with less difficulty prevented from making any impression. During this time Cortes was engaged in deep confultation with his officers, concerning the route which they ought to take in their retreat. They were now on the west fide of the lake. Tlascala, the only place where they could hope for a friendly reception, lay about fixty-four miles to the east of Mexico c; fo that they were obliged to go round the north end of the lake before they could fall into the road which led thither. A Tlascalan foldier undertook to be their guide, and conducted them through a country, in some places marshy, in others mountainous, in all ill-cultivated and thinly peopled. They marched for fix days with little respite, and under continual alarms, numerous bodies of the Mexicans hover-

ing

b Cortes, Relat. p. 248. B. Diaz. c. 128. Gomara, Cron. c. 109. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. x. c. 11, 12. E Villa Segnor Teatro Americanos, lib. ii. c. II.

ing around them, fometimes haraffing them at a distance with their missile weapons, and sometimes attacking them closely in front, in rear, in flank, with great boldness, as they now knew that they were not invincible. Nor were the fatigue and danger of those incessant conflicts the worst evils to which they were exposed. As the barren country through which they passed afforded hardly any provisions, they were reduced to feed on berries, roots, and the stalks of green maize; and at the very time that famine was depressing their spirits and wasting their strength, their situation required the most vigorous and unremitting exertions of courage and activity. Amidit those complicated distresses, one circumstance supported and animated the Spaniards. Their commander sustained this sad reverse of fortune with unshaken magnanimity. His prefence of mind never forfook him; his fagacity forefaw every event, and his vigilance provided for it. He was foremost in every danger, and endured every hardship with cheerfulness. The difficulties with which he was surrounded seemed to call forth new talents; and his foldiers, though despairing themselves, continued to follow him with encreasing considence in his abilities.

On the fixth day they arrived near to Otumba, not far from the road between Mexico and Tlascala. Early next morning they began to advance towards it, slying parties of the enemy still hanging on their rear; and, amidst the insults with which they accompanied their hostilities, Marina remarked that they often exclaimed with exultation, "Go on, robbers; go to the place where you shall quickly meet the vengeance due to your crimes." The meaning of this threat the Spaniards did not comprehend, until they reached the fummit of an eminence before them. There a spacious valley opened to their view, covered with a vast army, extending as far as the eye could reach. The Mexicans, while with one body of their troops they harassed the Spa-niards in their retreat, had affembled their principal force on the other fide of the lake; and marching along the road which led directly to Tlascala, posted it in the plain of Otumba, through which they knew Cortes must pass. At the fight of this incredible multitude, which they could survey at once from the rising ground, the Spaniards were assonished, and even the boldest began to despair. But Cortes, without allowing leisure for their fears to acquire strength by reslection, after warning them briefly that no alternative now remained but to conquer or to die, led them instantly to the charge. Mexicans waited their approach with unufual fortitude. Such, however, was the superiority of the Spanish discipline and arms, that the impression of this small body was irresistible; and whichever way its force was directed, it penetrated and dispersed the most numerous battalions. But while thefe gave way in one quarter, new combatants advanced from another, and the Spaniards, though successful in every attack, were ready to fink under those repeated efforts, without feeing any end of their toil, or any hope of victory. At that time Cortes obferved the great standard of the empire, which was carried before the Mexican general, advancing; and fortunately recollecting to have heard, heard, that on the fate of it depended the event of every battle, he affembled a few of his bravest officers, whose horses were still capable of service, and placing himself at their head, pushed forward towards the standard with an impetuosity which bore down every thing before it. A chosen body of nobles, who guarded the standard, made some resistance, but were soon broken. Cortes, with a stroke of his lance, wounded the Mexican general, and threw him to the ground. One of the Spanish officers alighting, put an end to his life, and laid hold of the imperial standard. The moment that their leader fell, and the standard, towards which all directed their eyes, disappeared, an universal panic struck the Mexicans, and, as if the bond which held them together had been dissolved, every ensign was lowered, each foldier threw away his weapons, and all fled with precipitation to the mountains. The Spaniards, unable to purfue them far, returned to collect the spoils of the field, which were so valuable, as to be some compensation for the wealth which they had loft in Mexico; for in the enemy's army were most of their principal warriors, dressed out in their richest ornaments, as if they had been marching to affured victory. Next day [July 8], to their great joy, they entered the Tlascalan territories d.

لم دوداداج

But, amidst their satisfaction in having got beyond the precincts of an hostile country, they could not look forward without solicitude, as they were still uncertain what reception they might

Cron. c. 110. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. x, c. 128. Gomara, might meet with from allies, to whom they returned in a condition very different from that in which they had lately fet out from their dominions. Happily for them, the enmity of the Tlascalans to the Mexican name was so inveterate, their defire to avenge the death of their countrymen fo vehement, and the afcendant which Cortes had acquired over the chiefs of the republic fo complete, that, far from entertaining a thought of taking any advantage of the diffressed fituation in which they beheld the Spaniards, they received them with a tenderness and cordiality which quickly dislipated all their fuspicions.

Some interval of tranquillity and indulgence was now absolutely necessary; not only that the Spaniards might give attention to the cure of their wounds, which had been too long neglected, but in order to recruit their strength, exhausted by fuch a long fuccession of fatigue and hardships. During this, Cortes learned that he and his companions were not the only Spaniards who had felt the effects of the Mexican enmity. A confiderable detachment, which was marching from Zempoalla towards the capital, had been cut off by the people of Tepeaca. A smaller party, returning from Tlascala to Vera Cruz, with the share of the Mexican gold allotted to the garrison, had been surprised and destroyed in the mountains. At a juncture when the life of every Spaniard was of importance, fuch losses were deeply felt. The schemes which Cortes was meditating rendered them peculiarly afflictive to him. While his enemies, and even many of own followers confidered the difafters which had befallen befallen him as fatal to the progress of his arms, and imagined that nothing now remained but speedily to abandon a country which he had invaded with unequal force, his mind, as eminent for perfeverance as for enterprise, was still bent on accomplishing his original purpose, of subjecting the Mexican empire to the crown of Castile. Severe and unexpected as the check was which he had received, it did not appear to him a fufficient reason for relinquishing the conquests which he had already made, or against refuming his operations with better hopes of fuccefs. The colony at Vera Cruz was not only fafe, but had remained unmolested. The people of Zempoalla and the adjacent districts had difcovered no symptoms of defection. The Tlascalans continued faithful to their alliance. On their martial spirit, easily rouzed to arms, and inflamed with implacable hatred of the Mexicans, Cortes depended for powerful aid. He had still the command of a body of Spaniards, equal in number to that with which he had opened his way into the centre of the empire, and had taken possession of the capital; so that with the benefit of greater experience, as well as more perfect knowledge of the country, he did not despair of quickly recovering all that he had been deprived of by untoward events,

Full of this idea, he courted the Tlascalan chiefs with such attention, and distributed among them so liberally the rich spoils of Otumba, that he was secure of obtaining whatever he should require of the republic. He drew a small supply of ammunition, and two or three sield-pieces, from his stores at Vera Cruz. He dispatched an officer of confidence with four ships of Narvaez's fleet to Hispaniola and Jamaica, to engage adventurers, and to purchase horses, gunpowder, and other military stores. As he knew that it would be vain to attempt the reduction of Mexico, unless he could secure the command of the lake, he gave orders to prepare, in the mountains of Tlascala, materials for building twelve brigantines, fo as they might be carried thither in pieces ready to be put together, and launched when he stood in need of their service.

But while, with provident attention, he was taking those necessary steps towards the execution of his measures, an obstacle arose in a quarter where it was least expected, but most formidable. The spirit of discontent and mutiny broke out in his own army. Many of Narvaez's followers were planters rather than foldiers, and had accompanied him to New Spain with fanguine hopes of obtaining fettlements, but with little inclination to engage in the hardships and dangers of war. As the same motives had induced them to enter into their new engagements with Cortes, they no fooner became acquainted with the nature of the service, than they bitterly repented of their choice. Such of them as had the good fortune to furvive the perilous adventures in which their own imprudence had involved them, happy in having made their escape, trembled at the thoughts of being exposed a fecond time to similar calamities. As soon as they discovered the intention of Cortes, they began fecretly to murmur and cabal, and waxing

Cortes Relat. p. 253, E. Gomara Cron. c. 117. gradually

gradually more audacious, they, in a body, offered a remonstrance to their general against the imprudence of attacking a powerful empire with his shattered forces, and formally required him to lead them back directly to Cuba. Though Cortes, long practifed in the arts of command, employed arguments, intreaties, and presents, to convince or to soothe them; though his own soldiers, animated with the spirit of their leader, warmly seconded his endeavours; he found their fears too violent and deep-rooted to be removed, and the utmost he could effect was to prevail with them to defer their departure for some time, on a promise that he would, at a more proper juncture, difmiss such as should defire it.

That the malcontents might have no leifure to brood over the causes of their disaffection, he refolved instantly to call forth his troops into action. He proposed to chastise the people of Tepeaca for the outrage which they had committed, and as the detachment which they had cut off happened to be composed mostly of soldiers who had ferved under Narvaez, their companions, from the defire of vengeance, engaged the more willingly in this war. He took the command in person [August], accompanied by a numerous body of Tlascalans, and in the space of a few weeks, after various encounters, with great slaughter of the Tepeacans, reduced that province to subjection. During several months, while he waited for the supplies of men and ammunition which he expected, and was carrying on his preparations for constructing the brigan-tines, he kept his troops constantly employed in various expeditions against the adjacent provinces, vinces, all of which were conducted with an uniform tenor of fuccefs. By these, his men became again accustomed to victory, and resumed their wonted sense of superiority; the Mexican power was weakened; the Tlascalan warriors acquired the habit of acting in conjunction with the Spaniards; and the chiefs of the republic delighted to see their country enriched with the spoils of all the people around them, and astonished every day with fresh discoveries of the irresistible prowess of their allies, they declined no effort requisite to support them.

All those preparatory arrangements, however, though the most prudent and efficacious which the fituation of Cortes allowed him to make, would have been of little avail, without a reinforcement of Spanish soldiers. Of this he was fo deeply sensible, that it was the chief object of his thoughts and wishes; and yet his only prospect of obtaining it from the return of the officer whom he had fent to the isles to folicit aid. was both distant and uncertain. But what neither his own fagacity nor power could have procured. he owed to a series of fortunate and unforeseen incidents. The governor of Cuba, to whom the fuccefs of Narvaez appeared an event of infallible certainty, having fent two small ships after him with new instructions, and a supply of men and military flores, the officer whom Cortes had appointed to command on the coast, artfully decoyed them into the harbour of Vera Cruz, seized the veffels, and eafily perfuaded the foldiers to follow the standard of a more able leader than him whom they were destined to join f. Soon after, three ships of more considerable force came into the harbour feparately. These belonged to an armament sitted out by Francisco de Garay, governor of Jamaica, who, being possessed with the rage of discovery and conquest which animated every Spaniard settled in America, had long aimed at intruding into some district of New Spain, and dividing with Cortes the glory and gain of annexing that empire to the crown of Castile. They unadvisedly made their attempt on the northern provinces, where the country was poor, and the people fierce and war-like; and, after a cruel succession of disasters, famine compelled them to venture into Vera Cruz, and cast themselves upon the mercy of their countrymen [Oct. 28]. Their fidelity was not proof against the splendid hopes and promifes which had feduced other adventurers, and, as if the spirit of revolt had been contagious in New Spain, they likewife abandoned the mafter whom they were bound to ferve, and inlifted under Cortes g. Nor was it America alone that furnished fuch unexpected aid. A ship arrived from Spain, freighted by fome private merchants with military stores, in hopes of a profitable market in a country, the fame of whose opulence begun to spread over Europe. Cortes eagerly purchased a cargo which to him was invaluable, and the crew, following the general example, joined him at Tlascala h.

From those various quarters, the army of Cortes was augmented with an hundred and eighty men, and twenty horses, a reinforcement too intensiderable to produce any consequence which would entitle it to have been mentioned in the history of other parts of the globe. But in that of America, where great revolutions were brought about by causes which seemed to bear no proportion to their effects, such small events rise into importance, because they were sufficient to decide with respect to the fate of kingdoms. Nor is it the least remarkable instance of the singular felicity conspicuous in many passages of Cortes's story, that the two persons chiefly instrumental in furnishing him with those season able supplies, should be an avowed enemy who aimed at his destruction, and an envious rival who wished to supplant him.

Cortes Relat. 253, F. B. Diaze c. 133. 1 Ibid. c. 136. would

The first effect of the junction with his new followers was to enable him to dismiss such of Narvaez's soldiers as remained with reluctance in his service. After their departure, he still mustered sive hundred and sifty infantry, of which fourscore were armed with muskets or cross-bows, forty horsemen, and a train of nine sield pieces. At the head of these, accompanied by ten thousand Tlascalans and other friendly Indians, Cortes began his march towards Mexico, on the twenty-eighth of December, six months after his disastrous retreat from that city k.

Nor did he advance to attack an enemy unprepared to receive him. Upon the death of Montezuma, the Mexican chiefs, in whom the right of electing the emperor was vested, had instantly raised his brother Quetlavaca to the throne. His avowed and inveterate enmity to

¹ Cortes, Relat. 255, E.

k Relat. 256, A. B. Diaz. c. 137.

the Spaniards would have been fufficient to gaintheir suffrages, although he had been less diftinguished for courage and capacity. He had an immediate opportunity of shewing that he was worthy of their choice, by conducting, in person, those sierce attacks which compelled the Spaniards to abandon his capital; and as foon as their retreat afforded him any respite from action, he took measures for preventing their return to Mexico, with prudence equal to the spirit which he had displayed in driving them out of it. As from the vicinity of Tlascala, he could not be unacquainted with the motions and intentions of Cortes, he observed the storm that was gathering, and began early to provide against it. He repaired what the Spaniards had ruined in the city, and strengthened it with such new fortifications as the skill of his subjects was capable of creeting. Befide filling his magazines with the usual weapons of war, he gave directions to make long spears headed with the fwords and daggers taken from the Spaniards, in order to annoy the cavalry. He summoned the people in every province of the empire to take arms against their oppressors, and as an encouragement to exert themselves with vigour, he promised them exemption from all the taxes which his predecessors had imposed 1. But what he laboured with the greatest earnestness was, to deprive the Spaniards of the advantages which they derived from the friendship of the Tlasca-lans, by endeavouring to persuade that people to renounce all connection with men, who were not only avowed enemies of the gods whom they worshipped, but who would not fail to subject them at last to the same yoke, which they were now inconsiderately lending their aid to impose upon others. These representations, no less striking than well founded, were urged so forcibly by his ambassadors, that it required all the address of Cortes to prevent their making a dangerous impression m.

Cortes, Relat. p. 253, E. 254, A. B. Diaz. c. 140. worshipped

But while Quetlavaca was arranging his plan of defence, with a degree of forelight uncommon in an American, his days were cut short by the small-pox. This distemper, which raged at that time in New Spain with fatal malignity, was unknown in that quarter of the globe, until it was introduced by the Europeans, and may be reckoned among the greatest calamities brought upon them by their invaders. In his stead the Mexicans raised to the throne Guatimozin, nephew and son-in-law of Montezuma, a young man of such high reputation for abilities and valour, that in this dangerous criss, his countrymen, with one voice, called him to the supreme command h.

1521.] As foon as Cortes entered the enemy's territories, he discovered various preparations to obstruct his progress. But his troops forced their way with little difficulty, and took possession of Tezeuco, the second city of the empire, situated on the banks of the lake about twenty miles from Mexico. Here he determined to establish his head-quarters, as the most proper station for launching his brigantines, as well as for making his approaches to the capital. In order to render his residence there more secure, he deposed the cazique or chief, who was at the head of that community, under pretext of some defect in his title, and substituted in his place a person whom a faction of the nobles pointed out as the right heir of that dignity. Attached to him by this benefit, the new cazique and his adherents served the Spaniards with inviolable fidelity P.

m B. Diaz. c. 129. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. x. c. 14. 19.

n B. Diaz. c. 130.

Villa Senor Theatro Americano, i. 156.

As the preparations for constructing the brigantines advanced slowly under the unskilful hands of foldiers and Indians, whom Cortes was obliged to employ in affifting three or four carpenters who happened fortunately to be in his fervice, and as he had not yet received the reinforcement which he expected from Hispaniola, he was not in a condition to turn his arms directly against the capital. To have attacked, at this period, a city so populous, so well prepared for defence, and in a fituation of fuch peculiar strength, must have exposed his troops to inevitable destruction. Three months elapsed before the materials for the brigantines were finished, and before he heard any thing with respect to the success of the officer whom he had sent to Hispaniola. This, however, was not a feafon of inaction to Cortes. He attacked fuccessively several of the towns fituated around the lake; and though all the Mexican power was exerted to obstruct his operations, he either compelled them to submit to the Spanish crown, or reduced them to ruins. The inhabitants of other towns

P Cortes, Relat. 256, &c. B. Diaz. c. 137. Gomara, Cron. c. 121. Herrera, dec. 3. c. 1.

he endeavoured to conciliate by more gentle means, and though he could not hold any intercourse with them but by the intervention of interpreters, yet under all the disadvantage of that tedious and imperfect mode of communication, he had acquired fuch thorough knowledge of the state of the country, as well as of the dispositions of the people, that he conducted his negotiations and intrigues with astonishing dexterity and success. Most of the cities adjacent to Mexico were originally the capitals of small independent states; and some of them having been but lately annexed to the Mexican empire, still retained the remembrance of their ancient liberty, and bore with impatience the rigorous yoke of their new malters. Cortes having early observed symptoms of their disaffection, availed himself of this knowledge to gain their confidence and friendship. By offering, with confidence, to deliver them from the odious dominion of the Mexicans, and by liberal promises of more indulgent treatment, if they would unite with him against their oppressors, would unite with him against their oppressors, he prevailed on the people of several considerable districts, not only to acknowledge the king of Castile as their sovereign, but to supply the Spanish camp with provisions, and to strengthen his army with auxiliary troops. Guatimozin, on the first appearance of defection among his subjects, exerted himself with vigour to prevent or to punish their revolt; but in spite of his efforts, the spirit continued to spread. The efforts, the spirit continued to spread. The Spaniards gradually acquired new allies, and with deep concern he beheld Cortes arming against his empire those very hands which ought to have been active in its defence; and ready to advance against the capital at the head of a numerous body of his own subjects 4.

While, by those various methods, Cortes was gradually circumscribing the Mexican power in such a manner that his prospect of overturning it seemed neither to be uncertain nor remote, all his schemes were well nigh defeated, by a conspiracy no less unexpected than dangerous. The foldiers of Narvaez had never united perfectly with the original companions of Cortes, nor did they enter into his measures with the same cordial zeal. Upon every occasion that required any extraordinary effort of courage or of patience, their spirits were apt to sink; and now, on a near view of what they had to encounter, in attempting to reduce a city fo inaccessible as Mexico, and defended by a numerous army, the resolution even of those among them who had adhered to Cortes when he was deserted by their affociates, began to fail. Their fears led them to prefumptuous and unfoldier-like discussions concerning the propriety of their general's measures, and the improbability of their fuccess. From these they proceeded to censure and invectives, and at last began to deliberate how they might provide for their own fafety, of which they deemed their commander to be totally negligent. Antonio Villefagna, a private foldier, but bold, intriguing, and strongly attached to Velasquez, artfully fomented this growing spirit of disaffection. His quarters became the rendezvous of the malcontents, where, after many confultations, they could discover no method of checking Cortes in his career, but by affaffinating him and his most considerable officers, and conferring the command upon fome person who would relinquish his wild plans, and adopt measures more consistent with the general fecurity. Despair inspired them with courage. The hour for perpetrating the crime, the perfons whom they destined as victims, the officers to fucceed them in command, were all named; and the conspirators figned an affociation, by which they bound themselves with most solemn oaths to mutual fidelity. But on the evening before the appointed day, one of Cortes's ancient followers, who had been feduced into the confpiracy, touched with compunction at the imminent danger of a man whom he had long been accustomed to revere, or struck with horror at his own treachery, went privately to his general, and revealed to him all that he knew. Cortes, though deeply alarmed, discerned at once what conduct was proper in a fituation fo critical. He repaired infantly to Villefagna's quarters, accompanied by some of his most trusty officers. The aftonishment and confusion of the man at this unexpected visit anticipated the confession of his guilt. Cortes, while his attendants feized the traitor, fnatched from his bosom a paper containing the affociation, figned by the confpira-Impatient to know how far the defection extended, he retired to read it, and found there names which filled him with furprise and forrow. But, aware how dangerous a strict scrutiny might prove at fuch a juncture, he confined his judicial judicial inquiries to Villefagna alone. As the proofs of his guilt were manifest, he was con-demned after a short trial, and next morning he was feen hanging before the door of the house in which he had lodged, Cortes called his troops together, and having explained to them the atrocious purpose of the conspirators, as well as the justice of the punishment inflicted on Villefagna, he added, with an appearance of fatisfaction, that he was entirely ignorant with respect to all the circumstances of this dark transaction, as the traitor, when arrefted, had fuddenly torn and fwallowed a paper which probably contained an account of it, and under the severest tortures possessed such constancy as to conceal the names of his accomplices. This artful declaration restored tranquillity to many a breaft that was throbbing, while he spoke, with consciousness of guilt and dread of detection; and by this prudent moderation, Cortes had the advantage of having difcovered, and of being able to observe such of his followers as were difaffected; while they, flattering themselves that their past crime was unknown, endeavoured to avert any fuspicion of it, by redoubling their activity and zeal in his fervice r.

⁹ Cortes, Relat. 256—260. B. Diaz. c. 137—140. Gomara, Cron. c. 122, 123. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. i. c. 1, 2.

Cortes did not allow them leifure to ruminate on what had happened; and as the most effectual means of preventing the return of a mutinous spirit, he determined to call forth his troops immediately to action. Fortunately, a proper occasion for this occurred without his seeming to court it. He received intelligence that the materials for building the brigantines were at length completely finished, and waited only for a body of Spaniards to conduct them to Tezeuco. The command of this convoy, confifting of two hundred foot foldiers, fifteen horsemen, and two field-pieces, he gave to Sandoval, who, by the vigilance, activity, and courage, which he manifested on every occasion, was growing daily in his confidence, and in the estimation of his fellow-foldiers. The service was no less singular than important; the beams, the planks, the masts, the cordage, the sails, the iron-work, and all the infinite variety of articles requifite for the construction of thirteen brigantines, were to be carried fixty miles over land, through a mountainous country, by people who were unacquainted with the ministry of domestic animals, or the aid of machines to facilitate any work of labour. The Tlascalans furnished eight thousand Tamenes, an inferior order of men destined for servile tasks, to carry the materials on their shoulders, and appointed fifteen thoufand warriors to accompany and defend them. Sandoval made the disposition for their progress with great propriety, placing the Tamenes in the centre, one body of warriors in the front, another in the rear, with considerable parties to cover the flanks. To each of these he joined fome Spaniards, not only to affift them in danger, but to accustom them to regularity and subordination. A body fo numerous, and fo much encumbered, advanced leifurely, but in excellent order; and in some places, where it was confined by the woods or mountains, the line of march extended extended above fix miles. Parties of Mexicans frequently appeared hovering around them on the high grounds; but perceiving no prospect of success in attacking an enemy continually on his guard, and prepared to receive them, they did not venture to molest him; and Sandoval had the glory of conducting fafely to Tezeuco, a convoy on which all the future operations of his countrymen depended.

Cortes, Relat. 283, C. B. Diaz. c. 146. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. i, c. 1,

This was followed by another event of no less moment. Four ships arrived at Vera Cruz from Hispaniola, with two hundred foldiers, cighty horses, two battering cannon, and a confiderable supply of ammunition and arms t. Elevated with observing that all his preparatory schemes, either for recruiting his own army, or impairing the force of the enemy, had now produced their full effect, Cortes, impatient to begin the fiege in form, hastened the launching of the brigantines. To facilitate this, he had employed a vast number of Indians for two months in deepening the small rivulet which runs by Tezeuco into the lake, and in forming it into a canal near two miles in length "; and though the Mexicans, aware of his intentions, as well as of the danger which threatened them, endeavoured frequently to interrupt the labourers, or to burn the brigantines, the work was at last completed x. On the twenty-eighth of April, all the Spanish troops, together with the auxiliary Indians, were drawn up on the banks of the canal; and with extraordinary military pomp, rendered more folemn by the celebration of the most facred rites of religion, the brigantines were launched. As they fell down the canal in order, Father Olmedo blessed them, and gave each its name. Every eye followed them with wonder and hope, until they entered the lake, when they hoisted their fails, and bore away before the wind. A general shout of joy was raised; all admiring that bold inventive genius, which, by means so extraordinary that their success almost exceeded belief, had acquired the command of a sleet, without the aid of which Mexico would have continued to set the Spanish power and arms at desiance.

^{*} Cortes, Relat. 260, C. E. B. Diaz. c. 140.

* Cortes, Relat. 259, F. 262, D. Gomara, Cron. c. 129.

* See Note CXIX. * B. Diaz. c. 140.

Cortes determined to attack the city from three different quarters; from Tepeaca on the north fide of the lake, from Tacuba on the west, and from Cuyocan towards the fouth. Those towns were fituated on the principal causeways which led to the capital, and intended for their defence. He appointed Sandoval to command in the first, Pedro de Alvarado in the second, and Christoval de Olid in the third; allotting to each a numerous body of Indian auxiliaries, together with an equal division of Spaniards, who, by the junction of the troops from Hifpaniola, amounted now to eighty-fix horsemen, and eight hundred and eighteen foot foldiers; of whom one hundred and eighteen were armed with muskets or cross-bows. The train of artillery confifted of three battering cannon, and fifteen field-pieces z. He referved for himself, as the station of greatest importance and danger, the conduct of the brigantines, each armed with one of his fmall cannon, and manned with twenty-five Spaniards.

Cortes, Relat. 266, C. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. i. C. 5. Gomara, Cron. c. 129. Cortes, Relat. 266, C.

As Alvarado and Olid proceeded towards the posts assigned them [May 10], they broke down the aqueducts which the ingenuity of the Mexicans had erected for conveying water into the capital, and by the distress to which this reduced the inhabitants, gave a beginning to the calamities which they were destined to suffer a. Alvarado and Olid found the towns of which they were ordered to take possession deserted by their inhabitants, who had sled for safety to the capital, where Guatimozin had collected the chief force of his empire, as there alone he could hope to make a successful stand against the formidable enemies who were approaching to assault him.

The first effort of the Mexicans was to destroy the fleet of brigantines, the fatal effects of whose operations they foresaw and dreaded. Though the brigantines, after all the labour and merit of Cortes in forming them, were of inconsiderable bulk, rudely constructed, and manned chiesly with landmen, hardly possessed of skill enough to conduct them, they must have been objects of terror to a people unacquainted with any navigation but that of their lake, and possessed of no vessel larger than a canoe. Necessity, however, urged Guatimozin to hazard the attack; and hoping to supply by numbers what he wanted in force, he assembled such a multitude of canoes as covered the face of the lake.

They

a. Cortes, Relat. 267, B. B. Diaz. c, 150. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. i. c. 13.

They rowed on boldly to the charge, while the brigantines, retarded by a dead calm, could scarcely advance to meet them. But as the enemy drew near, a breeze suddenly sprung up; in a moment the sails were spread, the brigantines, with the utmost ease, broke through their seeble opponents, overset many canoes, and dissipated the whole armament with such slaughter, as convinced the Mexicans, that the progress of the Europeans in knowledge and arts rendered their superiority greater on this new element, than they had hitherto found it by land b.

From that time Cortes remained master of the lake, and the brigantines not only preferved a communication between the Spaniards in their different stations, though at confiderable distance from each other, but were employed to cover the causeways on each side, and keep off the canoes, when they attempted to annoy the troops as they advanced towards the city. Cortes formed the brigantines in three divisions, appointing one to cover each of the stations from which an attack was to be carried on against the city, with orders to fecond the operations of the officer who commanded there. From all the three stations he pushed on the attack against the city with equal vigour; but in a manner so very different from the conduct of fieges in regular war, that he himself seems afraid it would appear no less improper than fingular, to persons unacquainted with his situation c. Each morning his troops affaulted the h Cortes, Relat. 267, C. B. Diaz. c. 150. Gomara, Cron. c. 131. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. i. c. 17.

Cortes, Relat. 270, F.

vol. 11. Y barricades barricades which the enemy had erected on the causeways, forced their way over the trenches which they had dug, and through the canals where the bridges were broken down, and en-deavoured to penetrate into the heart of the city, in hopes of obtaining some decisive advautage, which might force the enemy to furrender, and terminate the war at once; but when the obstinate valour of the Mexicans rendered the efforts of the day ineffectual, the Spaniards retired in the evening to their former quarters. Thus their toil and danger were, in fome measure, continually renewed; the Mexicans repairing in the night what the Spaniards had destroyed through the day, and recovering the posts from which they had driven them. But necessity prescribed this slow and untoward mode of operation. The number of his troops was fo fmall, that Cortes durft not, with a handful of men, attempt to make a lodgment in a city where he might be furrounded and annoyed by fuch a multitude of enemies. remembrance of what he had already fuffered by the ill-judged confidence with which he had ventured into fuch a dangerous fituation, was still fresh in his mind. The Spaniards, exhausted with fatigue, were unable to guard the various posts which they daily gained; and though their camp was filled with Indian auxiliaries, they durft not devolve this charge upon them, because they were so little accustomed to discipline, that no considence could be placed in their vigilance. Besides this, Cor-tes was extremely solicitous to preserve the city as much as possible from being destroyed, both because الماج احتفده because he destined it to be the capital of his conquests, and wished that it might remain as a monument of his glory. From all these confiderations, he adhered obstinately, for a month after the fiege was opened, to the fystem which he had adopted. The Mexicans, in their own defence, displayed valour which was hardly inferior to that with which the Spaniards attacked them. On land, on water, by night and by day, one furious conflict succeeded to another. Several Spaniards were killed, more wounded, and all were ready to fink under the toils of uninter-mitting fervice, which were rendered more intolerable by the injuries of the feafon, the periodical rains being now fet in with their ufual violence d.

: : 1100

Astonished and disconcerted with the length and difficulties of the fiege, Cortes determined to make one great effort to get possession of the city, before he relinquished the plan which he had hitherto followed, and had recourse to any other mode of attack. With this view, he fent instructions to Alvarado and Sandoval to advance with their divisions to a general affault, and took the command in person [July 3] of that posted on the causeway of Cuyocan. Animated by his prefence, and the expectation of some decisive event, the Spaniards pushed forward with irrefiftible impetuofity. They broke through one barricade after another, forced their way over the ditches and canals, and having entered the city, gained ground inceffantly, in spite of the multitude and ferocity of their opponents. Cortes, though delighted with the rapidity of his progress, did not forget that he might still find it necessary to retreat; and in order to secure it, appointed Julien de Alderete, a captain of chief note in the troops which he had received from Hispaniola, to fill up the canals and gaps in the causeway as the main body advanced. That officer, deeming it inglorious to be thus employed, while his companions were in the heat of action and the career of victory, neglected the important charge committed to him, and hurried on, inconsiderately, to mingle with the combatants. The Mexicans, whose military attention and skill were daily improving, no sooner observed this, than they carried an account of it to their monarch.

Guatimozin inflantly discerned the consequence of the error which the Spaniards had committed, and, with admirable presence of mind, prepared to take advantage of it. He commanded the troops posted in the front to flacken their efforts, in order to allure the Spaniards to push forward, while he dispatched a large body of chosen warriors through different ftreets, some by land, and others by water, towards the great breach in the causeway, which had been left open. On a fignal which he gave, the priefts in the principal temple ftruck the great drum confecrated to the god of war. No sooner did the Mexicans hear its doleful solemn found, calculated to inspire them with contempt of death and enthusiastic ardour, than they rushed upon the enemy with frantic rage. The Spa-niards, unable to refift men urged on no less by religious fury than hope of success, began to retire, at first leisurely, and with a good counter nance;

nance; but as the enemy pressed on, and their own impatience to escape increased, the terror and confusion became so general, that when they arrived at the gap in the causeway, Spaniards and Tlascalans, horsemen and infantry, plunged in promiscuously, while the Mexicans rushed upon them fiercely from every fide, their light canoes carrying them through shoals which the brigantines could not approach. In vain did Cortes attempt to stop and rally his slying troops; fear rendered them regardless of his entreaties or commands. Finding all his endea-yours to renew the combat fruitless, his next care was to fave fome of those who had thrown themselves into the water; but while thus employed, with more attention to their fituation than to his own, fix Mexican captains suddenly laid hold of him, and were hurrying him off in triumph; and though two of his officers rescued him at the expence of their own lives, he received several dangerous wounds before he could break loose. Above sixty Spaniards perished in the rout; and what rendered the difaster more afflicting, forty of these fell alive into the hands of an enemy never known to shew mercy to a captive e.

The approach of night, though it delivered the dejected Spaniards from the attacks of the enemy, ushered in, what was hardly less grievous, the noise of their barbarous triumph, and of the horrid festival with which they celebrated their victory. Every quarter of the city was illuminated; the great temple shone with such e Cortes, Relat. p. 273. B. Diaz. c. 152. Gomara, Cron. c. 138. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. i., c. 20.

peculiar splendour, that the Spainiards could plainly see the people in motion, and the priests busy in hastening the preparations for the death of the prisoners. Through the gloom, they fancied that they discerned their companions by the whiteness of their skins, as they were stript naked and compelled to dance before the image of the god to whom they were to be offered. They heard the shricks of those who were facrificed, and thought that they could distinguish each unhappy victim, by the well-known sound of his voice. Imagination added to what they really saw or heard, and augmented its horror. The most unfeeling melted into tears of compassion, and the stoutest heart trembled at the dreadful spectacle which they beheld f.

Cortes, who, besides all that he selt in common with his foldiers, was oppressed with the additional load of anxious reslections natural to a general on fuch an unexpected calamity, could not, like them, relieve his mind by giving vent to its anguish. He was obliged to assume an air of tranquillity, in order to revive the spirit and hopes of his followers. The juncture, indeed, required an extraordinary exertion of fortitude. The Mexicans, elated with their victory, fallied out next morning to attack him in his quarters. But they did not rely on the efforts of their own arms alone. They fent the heads of the Spaniards whom they had facrificed, to the leading men in the adjacent provinces, and affured them that the god of war, appealed by the blood of their invaders, which had been shed so plentifully on his altars, had declared with an audible voice, that in eight days time those hated enemies should be finally destroyed, and peace and prosperity re-established in the empire.

A prediction uttered with fuch confidence, and in terms fo void of ambiguity, gained universal credit among a people prone to superstition. The zeal of the provinces, which had already declared against the Spaniards, augmented; and feveral which had hitherto remained inactive, took arms, with enthusiastic ardour, to execute the decree of the gods. The Indian auxiliaries who had joined Cortes, accustomed to venerate the fame deities with the Mexicans, and to receive the responses of their priests with the same implicit faith, abandoned the Spaniards as a race of men devoted to certain destruction. Even the fidelity of the Tlascalans was shaken, and the Spanish troops were left almost alone in their stations. Cortes, finding that he attempted in vain to dispel the superstitious fears of his confederates by argument, took advantage, from the imprudence of those who had framed the prophecy, in fixing its accomplishment fo near at hand, to give a striking demonstration of its falsity. He suspended all military operations during the period marked out by the oracle. Under cover of the brigantines, which kept the enemy at a distance, his troops lay in fafety, and the fatal term expired without any disaster g,

Many of his allies, ashamed of their own credulity, returned to their station. Other tribes, judging that the gods who had now deceived the

Mexicans,

B. Diaz. c. 153. Gomara, Cron. c. 138.

fell

Mexicans, had decreed finally to withdraw their protection from them, joined his standard; and fuch was the levity of a simple people, moved by every slight impression, that in a short time after such a general defection of his confederates, Cortes faw himself, if we may believe his own account, at the head of a hundred and fifty thousand Indians. Even with fuch a numerous army, he found it necessary to adopt a new and more wary fyshem of operation. Instead of re-newing his attempts to become master of the city at once, by such bold but dangerous efforts of valour as he had already tried, he made his advances gradually, and with every possible pre-caution against exposing his men to any calamity similar to that which they still bewailed. As the Spaniards pushed forward, the Indians regularly repaired the causeways behind them. As foon as they got possession of any part of the town, the houses were instantly levelled with the ground. Day by day, the Mexicans, forced to retire as their enemies gained ground, were hemmed in within more narrow limits. Guatimozin, though unable to stop the career of the enemy, continued to defend his capital with obstinate resolution, and disputed every inch of ground. The Spaniards not only varied their mode of attack, but, by orders of Cortes changed the weapons with which they fought. They were again armed with the long Chinantlan spears, which they had employed with such fuccess against Narvaez; and, by the firm array in which this enabled them to range themselves, they repelled, with little danger, the loofe affault of the Mexicans: incredible numbers of them fell in the conflicts which they renewed every day h. While war wasted without, famine began to consume them within the city. The Spanish brigantines, having the entire command of the lake, rendered it almost impossible to convey to the besieged any supply of provisions by water. The immense number of his Indian auxiliaries enabled Cortes to shut up the avenues to the city by land. The stores which Guatimozin had laid up were exhausted, by the multitudes which had crowded into the capital, to defend their fovereign and the temples of their gods. Not only the people, but persons of the highest rank, felt the utmost distresses of famine. What they suffered, brought on infectious and mortal diffempers, the last calamity that visits befieged cities, and which filled up the meafure of their woes i.

But, under the pressure of so many and such various evils, the spirit of Guatimozin remained firm and unfubdued. He rejected, with fcorn, every overture of peace from Cortes; and difdaining the idea of fubmitting to the oppressors of his country, determined not to furvive its ruin. The Spaniards continued their progress. At length all the three divisions penetrated into the great square in the centre of the city, and made a secure lodgment there [July 27]. Three-fourths of the city were now reduced, and laid in ruins. The remaining quarter was fo closely pressed, that it could not long withstand assailants, who attacked it from their new station with superior

h Cortes, Relat. p. 275, C. 276, F. B. Diaz. c. 153. 1 Cortes, Relat. 276, E. 277, F. B. Diaz. 155. Gomara, Cron. c. 141. advantage,

advantage, and more affured expectation of fuc-cefs. The Mexican nobles, folicitous to fave the life of a monarch whom they revered, prevailed on Guatimozin to retire from a place where refistance was now vain, that he might rouse the more distant provinces of the empire to arms, and maintain there a more fuccessful struggle with the public enemy. In order to facilitate the execution of this measure, they endeavoured to amuse Cortes with overtures of submission, that, while his attention was employed in adjusting the articles of pacification, Guatimozin might escape unperceived. But they made this attempt upon a leader of greater fagacity and discernment than to be deceived by their arts. Cortes suspecting their intention, and aware of what moment it was to defeat it, and aware of what moment it was to defeat it, appointed Sandoval, the officer on whose vigilance he could most perfectly rely, to take the command of the brigantines, with strict injunctions to watch every motion of the enemy. Sandoval, attentive to the charge, observing some large canoes crowded with people rowing across the lake with extraordinary rapidity, instantly gave the signal to chace. Garcia Holguin, who commanded the swiftest-sailing brigantine, soon overtook them, and was preparing to fire on the foremost canoe, which seemed to carry some person whom all the rest followed and obeyed. person whom all the rest followed and obeyed. At once the rowers dropt their oars, and all on board, throwing down their arms, conjured him with cries and tears to forbear, as the emperor was there. Holguin eagerly feized his prize, and Guatimozin, with a dignified composure, gave himself up into his hands, requesting only that no infult might be offered to the empress or his children. When conducted to Cortes, he appeared neither with the fullen fierceness of a barbarian, nor with the dejection of a supplicant. "I have done," faid he, addressing himself to the Spanish general, "what became a monarch. I have defended my people to the last extremity. Nothing now remains but to die. Take this dagger," laying his hand on one which Cortes wore, "plant it in my breast, and put an end to a life which can no longer be of use k."

As foon as the fate of their fovereign was known, the refistance of the Mexicans ceased; and Cortes took possession of that small part of the capital [August 13] which yet remained undestroyed. Thus terminated the siege of Mexico, the most memorable event in the con-quest of America. It continued seventy-sive days, hardly one of which passed without some extraordinary effort of one party in the attack; or of the other in the defence of a city, on the fate of which both knew that the fortune of the empire depended. As the struggle here was more obstinate, it was likewise more equal, than any between the inhabitants of the Old and New Worlds. The great abilities of Guatimozin, the number of his troops, the peculiar fituation of his capital, fo far counterbalanced the fuperiority of the Spaniards in arms and discipline, that they must have relinquished the enterprife, if they had trufted for fuccess to themselves alone. But Mexico was overturned

k Cortes, Relat. 279. B. Diaz. c. 156. Gomara, Cron. 6. 142. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. ii. c. 7.

by the jealoufy of neighbours who dreaded its power, and by the revolt of subjects impatient to shake off its yoke. By their effectual aid, Cortes was enabled to accomplish what, without fuch support, he would hardly have ventured to attempt. How much foever this account of the reduction of Mexico may detract, on the one hand, from the marvellous relations of some Spanish writers, by ascribing that to simple and obvious causes which they attribute to the romantic valour of their countrymen, it adds, on the other, to the merit and abilities of Cortes, who, under every disadvantage, acquired such an afcendant over unknown nations, as to render them instruments towards carrying his schemes into execution 1.

The exultation of the Spaniards, on accomplishing this arduous enterprise, was at first excessive. But this was quickly damped by the cruel disappointment of those sanguine hopes, which had animated them amidst fo many hardships and dangers. Instead of the inexhaustible wealth which they expected from becoming masters of Montezuma's treasures, and the ornaments of fo many temples, their rapaciousness could collect only an inconfiderable booty amidst ruins and defolation m. Guatimozin, aware of his impending fate, had ordered what remained of the riches amassed by his ancestors to be thrown into the lake. The Indian auxiliaries, while the Spaniards were engaged in conflict with the enemy, had carried off the most valuable part of the spoil. The sum to be divided among the conquerors was so small, that many of them disdained to accept of the pittance which fell to their share, and all murmured and exclaimed; fome, against Cortes and his confidents, whom they suspected of having secretly appropriated to their own use a large portion of the riches which should have been brought into the common stock; others, against Guatimozin, whom they accused of obstinacy, in refusing to discover the place where he had hidden his treafure.

¹ See NOTE CXXI.

m The gold and filver, according to Cortes, amounted only to 120,000 pefos, Relat. 280, A. a fum much inferior to that which the Spaniards had formerly divided in Mexico. VI

Arguments, intreaties, and promises, were employed in order to soothe them, but with so little effect, that Cortes, from folicitude to check this growing spirit of discontent, gave way to a deed which stains the glory of all his great actions. Without regarding the former dignity of Guatimozin, or feeling any reverence for those virtues which he had displayed, he fubjected the unhappy monarch, together with his chief favourite, to torture, in order to force from them a discovery of the royal treasures, which it was supposed they had concealed. Guatimozin bore whatever the refined cruelty of his tormentors could inflict, with the invincible fortitude of an American warrior. His fellowsufferer, overcome by the violence of the anguish, turned a dejected eye towards his master, which seemed to implore his permission to reveal all that he knew. But the high-spirited prince, darting on him a look of authority mingled with fcorn, checked his weakness by asking, "Am I now reposing on a bed of roll in. z "flowers?" flowers?" Overawed by the reproach, the favourite persevered in his dutiful filence, and expired. Cortes, ashamed of a scene so horrid, rescued the royal victim from the hands of his torturers, and prolonged a life referved for new indignities and fufferings m.

The fate of the capital, as both parties had foreseen, decided that of the empire. The provinces submitted one after another to the conquerors. Small detachments of Spaniards marching through them without interruption, penetrated in different quarters to the great Southern Ocean, which, according to the ideas of Columbus, they imagined would open a short as well as eafy passage to the East Indies, and secure to the crown of Castile all the envied wealth of those fertile regions n; and the active mind of Cortes began already to form schemes for attempting this important discovery.

He did not know, that during the progress of his victorious arms in Mexico, the very scheme, of which he began to form some idea, had been undertaken and accomplished. this is one of the most splendid events in the history of the Spanish discoveries, and has been productive of effects peculiarly interesting to those extensive provinces which Cortes had now fubjected to the crown of Castile, the account of its rise and progress merits a particular detail.

Ferdinand Magalhaens, or Magellan, a Portuguese gentleman of honourable birth, having

m B. Diaz. c. 157. Gomara, Cron. c. 146. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. ii. c. 8. Torquem. Mon. Ind. i. 574.

Cortes, Relat. 280, D, &c. B. Diaz. c. 157.

Herrera, dec. 3. lib. ii. c. 17. Gomara, Cron. c. 149. ferved

DI- 160

ferved feveral years in the East Indies, with diftinguished valour, under the famous Albuquerque, demanded the recompence which he thought due to his fervices, with the boldness natural to a high spirited soldier. But as his general would not grant his fuit, and he expected greater justice from his fovereign, whom he knew to be a good judge and a generous rewarder of merit, he quitted India abruptly, and returned to Lisbon. In order to induce Emanuel to listen more favourably to his claim, he not only stated his past fervices, but offered to add to them by conducting his countrymen to the Molucca or Spice islands, by holding a westerly course; which he contended would be both shorter and less hazardous than that which the Portuguese now followed by the Cape of Good Hope, through the immense extent of the Eastern Ocean. This was the original and favourite project of Columbus, and Magellan founded his hopes of fuccess on the ideas of that great navigator, confirmed by many observations, the result of his own naval experience, as well as that of his countrymen in their intercourse with the East. But though the Portuguese monarchs had the merit of having first awakened and encouraged the spirit of difcovery in that age, it was their destiny, in the course of a few years, to reject two grand schemes for this purpose, the execution of which would have been attended with a great accession of glory to themselves, and of power to their kingdom. In confequence of some ill-founded prejudice against Magellan, or of some dark intrigue which contemporary historians have not explained, Emanuel would neither bestow the recompence which he claimed, nor approve of the scheme which he proposed; and dismissed him with a disdainful coldness intolerable to a man conscious of what he deserved, and animated with the fanguine hopes of fuccess peculiar to those who are capable of forming or of conducting new and great undertakings. In a transport of resentment [1517], Magellan formally re-nounced his allegiance to an ungrateful master, and sted to the court of Castile, where he ex-pected that his talents would be more justly estimated. He endeavoured to recommend himfelf by offering to execute, under the patronage of Spain, that scheme, which he had laid before the court of Portugal, the accomplishment of which, he knew, would wound the monarch against whom he was exasperated in the most tender part. In order to establish the justness of his theory, he produced the fame arguments which he had employed at Lisbon; acknowledging, at the same time, that the undertaking was both arduous and expensive, as it could not be attempted but with a fquadron of confiderable force, and victualled for at least two years. Fortunately, he applied to a minister who was not apt to be deterred, either by the boldness of a design, or the expence of carrying it into execution. Cardinal Ximenes, who at that time directed the affairs of Spain, difcerning at once what an increase of wealth and glory would accrue to his country by the success of Magellan's proposal, listened to it with a most favourable ear. Charles V. on his arrival in his Spanifla Spanish dominions, entered into the measure with no less ardour, and orders were issued for equipping a proper squadron at the public charge, of which the command was given to Magellan, whom the king honoured with the habit of St.

Jago and the title of Captain-General P.

On the tenth of August one thousand five hundred and nineteen, Magellan failed from Seville with five ships, which, according to the ideas of the age, were deemed to be of confiderable force, though the burden of the largest did not exceed one hundred and twenty tons. The crews of the whole amounted to two hundred and thirtyfour men, among whom were fome of the most skilful pilots in Spain, and several Portuguese failors, in whose experience, as more extensive, Magellan placed still greater confidence. After touching at the Canaries, he stood directly fouth towards the equinoctial line along the coast of America, but was fo long retarded by tedious calms, and fpent fo much time in fearching every bay and inlet for that communication with the Southern Ocean which he wished to discover, that he did not reach the river De la Plata till the twelfth of January [1520]. That spacious opening through which its vast body of water. pours into the Atlantic allured him to enter; but after failing up it for fome days, he concluded, from the shallowness of the stream and the freshness of the water, that the wished-for strait was not situated there, and continued his course towards the south. On the thirty-first of

P Herrera, dec. 2. lib. ii. c. 19. lib. iv. c. 9. Gomara, Hist. c. 91. Dalrymple's Collect. of Voyages to the South Pacific Ocean, vol. i. p. 1, &c.

March he arrived in the port of St. Julian, about forty-eight degrees fouth of the line, where he resolved to winter. In this uncomfortable station he loft one of his squadron, and the Spaniards fuffered fo much from the excessive rigour of the climate, that the crews of three of his ships, headed by their officers, rose in open mutiny. and infifted on relinquishing the visionary project of a desperate adventurer, and returning directly to Spain, This dangerous infurrection Magellan suppressed by an effort of courage no less prompt than intrepid, and inflicted exemplary punishment on the ringleaders. With the remainder of his followers, overawed but not reconciled to his scheme, he continued his voyage towards the fouth, and at length discovered, near the fiftythird degree of latitude, the mouth of a strait, into which he entered, notwithstanding the murmurs and remonstrances of the people under his command. After failing twenty days in that winding dangerous channel, to which he gave his own name, and where one of his ships deferted him, the great Southern Ocean opened to his view, and with tears of joy he returned thanks to Heaven for having thus far crowned his endeavours with success q.

But he was still at a greater distance than he imagined from the object of his wishes. He sailed during three months and twenty days in an uniform direction towards the north-west, without discovering land. In this voyage, the longest that had ever been made in the unbounded ocean,

⁹ Herrera, dec. 2. lib. iv. c. 10. lib. ix. c. 10, &c. Gomara, Hist. c. 92. Pigasetta Viaggio ap. Ramus. ii. p. 352, &c.

he suffered incredible distress. His stock of provisions was almost exhausted, the water became putrid, the men were reduced to the shortest all lowance with which it was possible to sustain life, and the fourvy, the most dreadful of all the ma-ladies with which fea-faring people are afflicted, began to spread among the crew. One circumstance alone afforded them some consolation; they enjoyed an uninterrupted course of fair weather, with fuch favourable winds, that Magellan bestowed on that ocean the name of Pacific, which it still retains. When reduced to fuch extremity that they must have funk under their fufferings, they fell in with a cluster of small but fertile islands [March 6], which afforded them refreshments in such abundance, that their health was foon re-established. From these isles, which he called De los Ladrones, he proceeded on his voyage, and foon made a more important discovery of the islands now known by the name of the Philippines. In one of these he got into an unfortunate quarrel with the natives, who attacked him with a numerous body of troops well armed; and while he fought at the head of his men with his usual valour, he fell

[April 26] by the hands of those barbarians; together with several of his principal officers.

The expedition was prosecuted under other commanders. After visiting many of the smaller isses scattered in the eastern part of the Indian ocean, they touched at the great island of Borneo [Nov. 8], and at length landed in Tidore, one of the Moluccas, to the astonishment of the Portuguese, who could not comprehend how the Spaniards, by holding a westerly course, had arrived at that fequestered seat of their most valuable commerce, which they themselves had discovered by failing in an opposite direction. There, and in the adjacent isles, the Spaniards found a people acquainted with the benefits of extensive trade, and willing to open an intercourse with a new nation. They took in a cargo of the precious spices, which are the distinguished production of those islands; and with that, as well as with specimens of the rich commodities yielded by the other countries which they had visited, the Vistory, which, of the two ships that remained of the squadron, was most fit for a long voyage, set sail for Europe [Jan. 1522], under the command of Juan Sebastion del Cano. He followed the course of the Portuguese, by the Cape of Good Hope, and, after many disasters and sufferings, he arrived at St. Lucar on the seventh of September one thousand sive hundred and twenty-two, having sailed round the globe in the space of three years and twenty-eight days r.

had

Though an untimely fate deprived Magellan of the fatisfaction of accomplishing this great undertaking, his contemporaries, just to his memory and talents, ascribed to him not only the honour of having formed the plan, but of having surmounted almost every obstacle to the completion of it; and in the present age his name is still ranked among the highest in the roll of eminerat and successful navigators. The naval glory of Spain now eclipsed that of every other nation; and by a singular felicity she had the merit, in the course of a few years, of discovering a new continent almost as large as that part of the earth which was formerly known, and of ascertaining by experience the form and extent of the whole terraqueous globe.

F Herrera, dec. 3. lib. i. c. 3. 9. lib. iv.c. i. Gomara, Cron. c. 93, &c. Pigafetta ap. Ramus. ii. p. 361, &c.

The Spaniards were not fatisfied with the glory of having first encompassed the earth; they expected to derive great commercial advantages from this new and boldest effort of their maritime skill. The men of science among them contended, that the spice islands, and several of the richest countries in the East, were so situated as to belong of right to the crown of Castile, in consequence of the partition made by Alexander VI. The merchants, without attending to this discussion, engaged eagerly in that lucrative and alluring commerce, which was now opened to them. The Portuguese, alarmed at the intrusion of such formidable rivals, remonstrated and negociated in Europe, while in Asia they obstructed the trade of the Spaniards by force of arms. Charles V. not sufficiently instructed with respect to the importance of this valuable branch of commerce, or distracted by the multiplicity of his schemes and operations, did not afford his subjects proper protection. At last, the low state of his sinances, exhausted by the efforts of his arms in every part of Europe, together with the dread of adding a new war with Portugal to those in which he was already engaged, induced him to make over his claim of the Moluccas to the Portuguese for three hundred and fifty thousand ducats. He referved, however, to the crown of Castile the right of reviving its pretensions on repayment of that sum; but other objects engrossed his attention and that of his successors; and Spain was finally excluded from a branch of commerce in which it was engaging with sanguine expectations of profit s.

of

Though the trade with the Moluccas was relinquished, the voyage of Magellan was followed by commercial effects of great moment to Spain. Philip II. in the year one thousand five hundred and fixty-four, reduced those islands which he discovered in the Eastern Ocean to subjection, and established settlements there; between which and the kingdom of New Spain, a regular intercourse, the nature of which shall be explained in its proper place, is still carried on. I return now to the transactions in New Spain.

At the time that Cortes was acquiring such extensive territories for his native country, and preparing the way for future conquests, it was his singular fate not only to be destitute of any commission or authority from the sovereign whom he was serving with such successful zeal, but to be regarded as an undutiful and seditious subject. By the influence of Fonseca, bishop of Burgos, his conduct in assuming the government of New Spain was declared to be an irregular usurpation, in contempt of the royal authority; and Christoval de Tapia received a commission, impowering him to supersede Cortes, to seize his person, to consiste his effects, to make a strict scrutiny into his proceedings, and to transmit the result of all the enquiries carried on in New Spain to the council of the Indies, of which the bishop of Burgos was president. A few weeks afeer the reduction of Mexico, Tapia landed at Vera Cruz with the royal mandate to strip its conqueror of his power, and to treat him as a criminal. But Fonseca had chosen a very improper instrument to wreak his vengeance on Cortes. Tapia had neither the reputation nor the talents that fuited the high command to which he was appointed. Cortes, while he publicly expressed the most respectful veneration for the emperor's authority, fecretly took measures to defeat the effect of his commission; and having involved Tapia and his followers in a multiplicity of negotiations and conferences, in which he sometimes had recourse to threats, but more frequently employed bribes and promifes, he at length prevailed on that weak man to abandon a province which he was unworthy of governing t.

Herrera, dec. 3. lib. vi. c. 5, &c. dec. 4. lib. v. e. 7, &c.

But notwithstanding the fortunate dexterity with which he had eluded this danger, Cortes was so sensible of the precarious tenure by which he held his power, that he dispatched deputies to Spain [May 15], with a pompous account of the success of his arms, with farther specimens of the productions of the country, and with rich presents to the emperor, as the earnest of suture contributions from his new conquest; requesting, in recompence for all his services, the approbation of his proceedings, and that he might be entrusted with the government of those dominions, which his conduct, and the valour of his followers, had added to the crown of Cast Herrera, dec. 3 lib. iii. c. 16. dec. iv. c. 1. Cortes, Relat. 281, E. B. Diaz. c. 158.

tile. The juncture in which his deputies reached the court was favourable. The internal commotions in Spain, which had disquieted the beginning of Charles's reign, were just appealed ". The ministers had leifure to turn their attention towards foreign affairs. The account of Cortes's victories filled his countrymen with admiration. The extent and value of his conquests became the object of vait and interesting hopes. Whatever stain he might have contracted, by the irregularity of the steps which he took in order to attain power, was fo fully effaced by the splendour and merit of the great actions which this had enabled him to perform, that every heart revolted at the thought of inflicting any censure on a man, whose services entitled him to the highest marks of distinction. The public voice declared warmly in favour of his pretenfions, and Charles arriving in Spain about this time, adopted the sentiments of his subjects with a youthful ardour. Notwithstanding the claims of Velasquez, and the partial representations of the bishop of Burgos, the emperor appointed Cortes captain-general and governor of New Spain, judging that no perfon was fo ca-pable of maintaining the royal authority, or of establishing good order both among his Spanish and Indian subjects, as the victorious leader whom the former had long been accustomed to obey, and the latter had been taught to fear and to respect x.

Even before his jurisdiction received this legal fanction, Cortes ventured to exercise all the powers of a governor, and by various arrangements, endeavoured to render his conquest a fecure and beneficial acquifition to his country. He determined to establish the seat of government in its ancient station, and to raise Mexico again from its ruins; and having conceived high ideas concerning the future grandeur of the state of which he was laying the foundation, he began to rebuild its capital on a plan which hath gradually formed the most magnificent city in the New World. At the same time, he employed skilful persons to search for mines in different parts of the country, and opened some which were found to be richer than any which the Spaniards had hitherto discovered in America. He detached his principal officers into the remote provinces, and encouraged them to fettle there, not only by bestowing upon them large tracts of land, but by granting them the same dominion over the Indians, and the same right to their service, which the Spaniards had affumed in the islands.

[&]quot; Hist. of Charles V. vol. ii. b. iii.

^{*} Herrera, dec. 3. lib. iv. c. 3. Gomara, Cron. c. 164, 165. B. Diaz. 167, 168.

It was not, however, without difficulty that the Mexican empire could be entirely reduced into the form of a Spanish colony. Enraged and rendered desperate by oppression, the natives often forgot the superiority of their enemies, and ran to arms in desence of their liberties. In every contest, however, the European valour and discipline prevailed. But fatally for the honour of their country, the Spaniards sullied the glory redounding from these repeated victories by their mode of treating the vanquished people. After taking Guatimozin, and becoming masters of his capital, they supposed that the king of YOL. II.

Castile entered on possession of all the rights of the captive monarch, and affected to confider every effort of the Mexicans to affert their own independence, as the rebellion of vasfals against their fovereign, or the mutiny of slaves against their master. Under the sanction of those illfounded maxims, they violated every right that should be held facred between hostile nations. After each infurrection, they reduced the common people in the provinces which they fubdued, to the most humiliating of all conditions, that of perfonal fervitude. Their chiefs, fupposed to be more criminal, were punished with greater severity, and put to death in the most ignominious or the most excruciating mode, that the insolence or the cruelty of their conquerors could devife. In almost every district of the Mexican empire, the progress of the Spanish arms is marked with blood, and with deeds so atrocious, as difgrace the enterprifing valour that conducted them to success. In the country of Panuco, fixty caziques or leaders, and four liundred nobles, were burnt at one time. Nor was this shocking barbarity perpetrated in any fudden fally of rage, or by a commander of inferior note. It was the act of Sandoval, an officer whose name is entitled to the second rank in the annals of New Spain, and executed after a folemn confultation with Cortes; and to complete the horror of the scene, the children and relations of the wretched victims were affembled, and compelled to be spectators of their dying agonies y. It feems hardly possible to exceed in horror this dreadful example of feverity; but it was followed by another, which affected the Mexicans still more sensibly, as it gave them a most feeling proof of their own degradation, and of the small regard which their haughty masters retained for the ancient dignity and splendour of their state. On a slight suspicion, confirmed by very imperfect evidence, that Guatimozin had formed a scheme to shake off the yoke, and to excite his former subjects to take arms, Cortes, without the formality of a trial, ordered the unhappy monarch, together with the caziques of Tezeuco and Tacuba, the two persons of greatest eminence in the empire, to be hanged; and the Mexicans, with astonishment and horror, beheld this difgraceful punishment inflicted upon persons, to whom they were accustomed to look up with reverence, hardly inferior to that which they paid to the gods themselves z. The example of Cortes and his principal officers encouraged and justified persons of subordinate rank to venture upon committing greater excesses. Nuno de Guzman, in particular, stained an illustrious name by deeds of peculiar enormity and rigour, in various expeditions which he conducted a.

y Cortes, Relat. 291, C. Gomara, Cron. c. 155.

One circumstance, however, faved the Mexicans from farther confumption, perhaps from one as complete as that which had depopulated the islands. The first conquerors did not attempt to fearch for the precious metals in the bowels of the earth. They were neither sufficiently wealthy to carry on the expensive works which are requifite for opening those deep recesses

Gomara, Cron. c. 170. B. Diaz. c. 177. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. viii. c. 9. See Note CXXII.

Berrera, dec. 4 & 5, passin.

500/01/

where nature has concealed the veins of gold and filver, not fufficiently skilful to perform the ingenious operations by which those precious metals are separated from their respective ores. They were fatisfied with the more fimple method, practifed by the Indians, of washing the earth carried down rivers and torrents from the mountains, and collecting the grains of native metal deposited there. The rich mines of New Spain, which have poured forth their treasures with fuch profusion on every quarter of the globe, were not discovered for several years after the conquest b. By that time [1552, &c.], a more orderly government and police were introduced into the colony; experience, derived from former errors, had suggested many useful and humane regulations for the protection and prefervation of the Indians; and though it then became necessary to increase the number of those employed in the mines, and they were engaged in a species of labour more pernicious to the human constitution, they suffered less hardship or diminution than from the ill-judged, but less extensive, schemes of the first conquerors.

While it was the lot of the Indians to suffer, their new masters seem not to have derived any considerable wealth from their ill-conducted refearches. According to the usual fate of first settlers in new colonies, it was their lot to encounter danger, and to struggle with difficulties; the fruits of their victories and toils were reserved for times of tranquillity, and reaped by successors of greater industry, but of inferior merit. The early historians of America abound with accounts of the sufferings and of the poverty of its con-querors. In New Spain, their condition was rendered more grievous by a peculiar arrangement. When Charles V. advanced Cortes to the government of that country, he at the same time appointed certain commissioners to receive and administer the royal revenue there, with independent jurisdiction d. These men, chosen from inferior stations in various departments of public business at Madrid, were so much elevated with their promotion, that they thought they were called to act a part of the first confequence. But being accustomed to the minute formalities of office, and having contracted the narrow ideas fuited to the sphere in which they had hitherto moved, they were astonished, on arriving in Mexico [1524], at the high authority which Cortes exercifed, and could not conceive that the mode of administration, in a country recently subdued and settled, must be different from what took place in one where tranquillity and regular government had been long established. In their letters, they represented Cortes as an ambitious tyrant, who having usurped a jurifdiction superior to law, aspired at independence, and by his exorbitant wealth, and extensive influence, might accomplish those disloyal scemes which he apparently meditated. These infinuations made fuch deep impression upon the Spanish ministers, most of whom had been formed to business under the jealous and rigid administration of Ferdinand, that, unmindful of all Cortes's past services, and regardless of what

c. 3. lib. iv. c. 3. E. B. Diaz. c. 209. d Herrera, e Ibid. lib. v. c. 14. dec. 3. lib. iv. c. 3.

he was then fuffering in conducting that extraordinary expedition, in which he advanced from the lake of Mexico to the western extremities of Honduras, they insused the same suspicions into the mind of their master, and prevailed on him to order a solemn inquest to be made into his conduct [1525], with powers to the licentiate Ponce de Leon, entrusted with that commission, to seize his person, if he should find that expedient, and send him prisoner to Spain s.

The sudden death of Ponce de Leon, a few days after his arrival in New Spain, prevented the execution of this commission. But as the object of his appointment was known, the mind of Cortes was deeply wounded with this unexpected return for services which far exceeded whatever any fubject of Spain had rendered to his fovereign. He endeavoured, however, to maintain his station, and to recover the confidence of the court. But every person in office, who had arrived from Spain since the conquest, was a Ipy upon his conduct, and with malicious ingenuity gave an unfavourable representation of all his actions. The apprehensions of Charles and his ministers increased. A new commission of enquiry was issued [1528], with more ex-tensive powers, and various precautions were taken in order to prevent or to punish him, if he should be so presumptuous as to attempt what was inconfishent with the fidelity of a fubject h. Cortes beheld the approaching crisis of his fortune with all the violent emotions natural to a haughty mind, conscious of high desert, and receiving unworthy treatment. But though some of his desperate followers urged him to affert his own rights against his ungrateful country, and with a bold hand to seize that power which the courtiers meanly accused him of coveting, he retained such self-command, or was actuated with such sentiments of loyalty, as to reject their dangerous counsels, and to choose the only course in which he could secure his own dignity, without departing from his duty. He resolved not to expose himself to the ignominy of a trial, in that country which had been the scene of his triumphs; but without waiting for the arrival of his judges, to repair directly to Castile, and commit himself and his cause to the justice and generosity of his sovereign k.

f See Note CXXIII. E Herrera, dec. 3. lib. viii. c. 14, 15. h Ibid. c. 15. dec. 4. lib. ii. c. 1. lib. iv. c. 9, 10. B. Diaz. c. 172. 196. Gomara, Cron. c. 166.

Cortes appeared in his native country with the splendour that suited the conqueror of a mighty kingdom. He brought with him a great part of his wealth, many jewels and ornaments of great value, several curious productions of the country, and was attended by some Mexicans of the first rank, as well as by the most considerable of his own officers. His arrival in Spain removed at once every suspicion and fear that had been entertained with respect to his intentions. The emperor, having now nothing to apprehend from the designs of Cortes, received him like a person whom consciousness of his own innocence had brought into the presence of

See NOTE CXXIV.

B. Diaz. c. 194. k Herrera, dec. 3. lib. iv. c. 8.

his master, and who was entitled, by the eminence of his services, to the highest marks of distinction and respect. The order of St. Jago, the title of Marquis del Valle de Guaxaca, the grant of an ample territory in New Spain, were successively bestowed upon him; and as his manners were correct and elegant, although he had passed the greater part of his life among rough adventurers, the emperor admitted him to the same familiar intercourse with himself, that was enjoyed by noblemen of the first rank m.

But, amidst those external proofs of regard, symptoms of remaining distrust appeared. Though Cortes earnestly solicited to be reinflated in the government of New Spain, Charles, too fagacious to commit fuch an important charge to a man whom he had once suspected, peremptorily refused to invest him again with powers which he might find it impossible to control. Cortes, though dignified with new titles, returned to Mexico with diminished authority. The military department, with powers to attempt new discoveries, was left in his hands; but the supreme direction of civil affairs was placed in a board, called The Audience of New Spain. At a subsequent period, when, upon the increase of the colony, the exertion of authority more united and extensive became necessary, Antonio de Mendoza, a nobleman of high rank, was fent thither as Viceroy, to take the government into his hands,

This division of power in New Spain, proved, as was unavoidable, the source of perpetual dis-

m Herrera, dec. 3. lib. iv. c. 1. lib. vi. c. 4. B. Diaz. c. 196. Gom. Cron. c. 182.

260 fention, which embittered the life of Cortes, and thwarted all his schemes. As he had now no opportunity to difplay his active talents but in attempting new discoveries, he formed various fchemes for that purpose, all of which bear impressions of a genius that delighted in what was bold and splendid. He early entertained an idea, that, either by steering through the gulf of Florida along the east coast of North America, some strait would be found that communicated with the western ocean; or that, by examining the ishmus of Darien, some passage would be discovered between the North and South Seas ". But having been disappointed in his expectations with respect to both, he now confined his views to such voyages of discovery as he could make from the ports of New Spain in the South Sea. There he fitted out succelfively feveral small squadrons, which either perished in the attempt, or returned without making, any discovery of moment. Cortes, weary of entrusting the conduct of his operations weary of entruiting the conduct of his operations to others, took the command of a new armament in perion [1536], and, after enduring incredible hardships, and encountering dangers of every species, he discovered the large peninfula of California, and surveyed the greater part of the gulf which separates it from New Spain. The discovery of a country of such extent would have resected credit on a common adventurer; but it could add little new honour to the name of Cortes, and was far from fatisfying the fan-guine expectations which he had formed o.

n Cortes, Relat. Ram. iii. 294, B. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. viii. c. 9, 10. dec. 8. lib. vi. c. 14. Venegas, Hift, of Californ. i. 125. Lorenzana, Hift, p. 322, &c. Difgusted

Disgusted with ill success, to which he had not been accustomed, and weary of contesting with adversaries to whom he considered it as a disgrace to be opposed, he once more fought for redrefs in his native country [1540]. But his reception there was very different from that which gratitude, and even decency, ought to have secured for him. The merit of his ancient exploits was already, in a great measure, forgotten, or eclipfed by the fame of recent and more valuable conquests in another quarter of America. No service of moment was now expected from a man of declining years, and who began to be unfortunate. The emperor behaved to him with cold civility; his ministers treated him, fometimes with neglect, fometimes with infolence. His grievances received no redrefs; his claims were urged without effect; and after feveral years spent in fruitless application to ministers and judges, an occupation the most irksome and mortifying to a man of high spirit, who had moved in a sphere where he was more accustomed to command than to solicit, Cortes ended his days on the fecond of December one thousand five hundred and forty-feven, in the fixty-fecond year of his age. His fate was the same with that of all the persons who distinguished themselves in the discovery or conquest of the New World. Envied by his contemporaries, and ill requited by the court which he ferved, he has been admired and celebrated by fucceeding ages. Which has formed the most just estimate of his character, an impartial confideration of his actions must determine.

of the state of th

Jonay 651

Cores, Collect Mores Oil Stone

if he a flower primary broads his on the

tail softell tails on theo for it

BOOK VI.

1523.] FROM the time that Nugnez de Balboa discovered the great Southern Ocean, and received the first obscure hints concerning the opulent countries with which it might open a communication; the wishes and schemes of every enterprifing person in the colonies of Darien and Panama were turned towards the wealth of those unknown regions. In an age when the fpirit of adventure was fo ardent and vigorous, that large-fortunes were wasted, and the most alarming dangers braved, in purfuit of discoveries merely possible, the faintest ray of hope was followed with an eager expectation, and the flightest information was sufficient to inspire fuch perfect confidence, as conducted men to the most arduous undertakings a.

Accordingly, feveral armaments were fitted out in order to explore and take possession of the countries to the east of Panama, but under the conduct of leaders whose talents and resources were unequal to the attempt b. As the excurfions of those adventurers did not extend beyond the limits of the province to which the Spaniards have given the name of Tierra Firme, a mountainous region covered with woods, thinly inhabited, and extremely unhealthy, they returned with difmal accounts concerning the diftreffes to which they had been exposed, and the unpromising aspect of the places which they had visited. Damped by these tidings, the rage for discovery in that direction abated; and it became the general opinion, that Balboa had founded visionary hopes, on the tale of an ignorant Indian, ill understood, or calculated to deceive.

A See Note CXXV. b Calancha, Coronica, p. 100. for

1524.] But there were three persons settled in Panama on whom the circumstances which deterred others made fo little impression, that at the very moment when all confidered Balboa's expectations of discovering a rich country, by fleering towards the east, as chimerical, they resolved to attempt the execution of his scheme. The names of those extraordinary men were Francisco Pizarro, Diego de Almagro, and Hernando Luque. Pizarro was the natural fon of a gentleman of an honourable family by a very low woman, and, according to the cruel fate which often attends the offspring of unlawful love, had been so totally neglected in his youth by the author of his birth, that he seems to have destined him never to rise beyond the condition of his mother. In consequence of this ungenerous idea, he fet him, when bordering on manhood, to keep hogs. But the aspiring mind of young Pizarro disdaining that ignoble occupation, he abruptly abandoned his charge, enlisted as a soldier, and, after serving some years in Italy, embarked for America, which, by opening such a boundless range to active talents, allured every adventurerer whose fortune was not equal to his ambitious thoughts. There Pizarro early distinguished himself. With a temper of mind no less daring than the constitution of his body was robust, he was foremost in every danger, patient under the greateft

Though so illiterate that he could not even read, he was soon considered as a man formed to command. Every operation committed to his conduct proved successful, as, by a happy but rare conjunction, he united perseverance with ardour, and was as cautious in executing, as he was bold in forming his plans. By engaging early in active life, without any resource but his own talents and industry, and by depending on himself alone in his struggles to emerge from obscurity, he acquired such a thorough knowledge of affairs, and of men, that he was sitted to assume a superior part in conducting the former, and in governing the latter.

Almagro had as little to boast of his descent as Pizarro. The one was a bastard, the other a foundling. Bred, like his companion, in the camp, he yielded not to him in any of the soldierly qualities of intrepid valour, indefatigable activity, or infurmountable constancy in enduring the hardships inseparable from military service in the New World. But in Almagro these virtues were accompanied with the openness, generosity, and candour, natural to men whose profession is arms; in Pizarro, they were united with the address, the craft, and the dissimulation of a politician, with the art of concealing his own purposes, and with sagacity to penetrate

Hernando de Luque was an ecclefiastic, who acted both as priest and schoolmaster at Panama, and, by means which the cotemporary writers

VOL. II. BB

into those of other men.

have

Gomara, Hist. c. 144. Zarate, lib. iv. c. 107.

have not described, had amassed riches that inspired him with thoughts of rising to greater eminence.

Such were the men destined to overturn one of the most extensive empires on the face of the earth. Their confederacy for this purpose was authorised by Pedrarias, the governor of Panama. Each engaged to employ his whole fortune in the adventure. Pizarro, the least wealthy of the three, as he could not throw fo large a fum as his affociates into the common flock, engaged to take the department of greatest fatigue and danger, and to command in person the armament which was to go first upon discovery. Almagro offered to conduct the supplies of provisions and reinforcements of troops, of which Pizarro might stand in need. Luque was to remain at Panama to negotiate with the governor, and superintend whatever was carrying on for the general interest. As the spirit of enthusiasm uniformly accompanied that of adventure in the New World, and by that strange union both acquired an increase of force, this confederacy, formed by ambition and avarice, was confirmed by the most folemn act of religion. Luque celebrated mass, divided a consecrated host into three, and referving one part to himfelf, gave the other two to his affociates, of which they partook; and thus, in the name of the Prince of Peace, ratified a contract of which plunder and bloodfhed were the objects d.

The attempt was begun with a force more fuited to the humble condition of the three affociates, than to the greatness of the enterprise in d Herrera, dec. 3. lib. vi. c. 13. Zarate, lib. i. c. 1. which

T.Stothard R.A.del .

Published Peb. 11. 1801, by Cadell & Davies, Strand .

which they were engaged. Pizarro fet sail from Panama with a single vessel [Nov. 14], of small burden, and a hundred and twelve men. But in that age, fo little were the Spaniards acquainted with the peculiarities of climate in America, that the time which Pizarro chose for his departure was the most improper in the whole year; the periodical winds, which were then fet in, being directly adverse to the course which he purposed to steer c. After beating about for feventy days, with much danger and incessant fatigue, Pizarro's progress towards the southeast was not greater than what a skilful navigator will now make in as many hours. [1525.] He touched at feveral places on the coast of Tierra Firme, but found every where the fame uninviting country which former adventurers had described; the low grounds converted into swamps by an overflowing of rivers; the higher, covered with impervious woods; few inhabitants, and those fierce and hostile. Famine, fatigue, frequent rencounters with the natives, and above all, the diftempers of a moift, fultry climate, combined in wasting his slender band of followers. The undaunted resolution of their leader continued, however, for some time, to sustain their spirits, although no sign had yet appeared of discovering those golden regions to which he had promifed to conduct them. At length he was obliged to abandon that inhofpitable coast, and retire to Chuchama, opposite to the pearl islands, where he hoped to receive a supply of provisions and troops from Panama.

E Herrera, dec. 4. lib. ii. c. 8. Xerez, p. 179.

But Almagro having failed from that port with feventy men, flood directly towards that part of the continent where he hoped to meet with his affociate. Not finding him there, he landed his foldiers, who, in fearthing for their companions, underwent the fame diffresses, and were exposed to the same dangers, which had driven them out of the country. Repulfed at length by the Indians in a sharp conflict, in which their leader lost one of his eyes by the wound of an arrow, they likewise were compelled to reimbark. Chance led them to the place of Pizarro's retreat; where they found fome consolation in recounting to each other their adventures, and comparing their sufferings. As Almagro had advanced as far as the river St. Juan [June 24], in the protince of Popayan, where both the country and inhabitants appeared with a more promising aspect, that dawn of better fortune was sufficient to determine such sanguine projectors not to abandon their scheme, notwithstanding all that they had suffered in prosecuting it s.

1526.] Almagro repaired to Panama, in hopes of recruiting their fliattered troops. But what he and Pizarro had suffered, gave his countrymen such an unfavourable idea of the service, that it was with difficulty he could levy fourfcore men s. Feeble as this reinforcement was, Almagro took the command of it, and having joined Pizarro, they did not hesitate about resuming their operations. After a long series of disasters and disappointments, not inferior to those which they had already experienced, part of the armament reached the Bay of St. Matthew, on the coast of Quito, and landing at Tacamez, to the fouth of the river of Emeraulds, they beheld a country more champaign and fertile than any they had yet discovered in the Southern Ocean, the natives clad in garments of woollen or cotton stuff, and adorned with feveral trinkets of gold and filver,

Bull.

f Herrera, dec. 3. lib. viii. c. 11, 12. See Note CXXVI.

Zarate, lib. i. c. 16 and Add A ...

But, notwithstanding those favourable appearances, magnified beyond the truth, both by the vanity of the persons who brought the report from Tacamez, and by the fond imagination of those who liftened to them, Pizarro and Almagro durst not venture to invade a country so populous with a handful of men enfeebled by fatigue and difeases. They retired to the small island of Gallo, where Pizarro remained with part of the troops, and his affociate returned to Panama, in hopes of bringing fuch a reinforcement as might enable them to take possession of the opu-

lent territories, whose existence seemed to be no longer doubtful h. But some of the adventurers, less enterprising, or less hardy than their leaders, having fecretly conveyed lamentable accounts of their fufferings and losses to their friends at Panama, Almagro met with an unfavourable reception from Pedro de los Rios, who had fucceeded Pedrarias in the government of that fettlement. After weighing the matter with that cold occonomical prudence which appears the first of all virtues to persons whose limited faculties are incapable of conceiving or executing great defigns, he concluded an expedition, attended with fuch certain waste of h Xerez, 181. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. viii. c. 13.

men, to be so detrimental to an infant and feeble colony, that he not only prohibited the raising of new levies, but dispatched a vessel to bring home Pizarro and his companions from the island of Gallo. Almagro and Luque, though deeply affected with those measures, which they could not prevent, and durft not oppose, found means of communicating their fentiments privately to Pizarro, and exhorted him not to relinquish an enterprise that was the foundation of all their hopes, and the only means of re-establishing their reputation and fortune, which were both on the decline. Pizarro's mind, bent with inflexible obstinacy on all its purposes, needed no incentive to perfift in the scheme. He peremptorily refused to obey the governor of Panama's orders, and employed all his address and eloquence in perfuading his men not to abandon him. But the incredible calamities to which they had been exposed were still so recent in their memories, and the thoughts of revisiting their families and friends after a long absence, rushed with fuch joy into their minds, that when Pizarro drew a line upon the fand with his fword, permitting such as wished to return home to pass over it, only thirteen of all the daring veterans in his fervice had refolution to remain with their commander i

This fmall, but determined band, whose names the Spanish historians record with deserved praise, as the persons to whose persevering fortitude their country is indebted for the most valuable of all its American possessions, fixed their residence

Herrera, dee. 3. lib. x. c. 2, 3. Zarate, lib. i. c. 2. Xerez, 181. Gomara, Hist, c. 109.

dence in the island of Gorgona. This, as it was farther removed from the coast than Gallo, and uninhabited, they confidered as a more fecure retreat, where, unmolested, they might wait for supplies from Panama, which they trusted that the activity of their affociates would be able to procure. Almagro and Luque were not inattentive or cold folicitors, and their inceffant importunity was feconded by the general voice of the colony, which exclaimed loudly against the infamy of exposing brave men, engaged in the public fervice, and chargeable with no error but what flowed from an excess of zeal and courage, to perish like the most odious criminals in a defeit island. Overcome by those entreaties and expostulatious, the governor at last consented to fend a small vessel to their relief. But that he might not feem to encourage Pizarro to any new enterprise, he would not permit one landman to embark on board of it.

By this time, Pizarro and his companions had remained five months in an island, infamous for the most unhealthy climate in that region of America k. During all this period, their eyes were turned towards Panama, in hopes of fuccour from their countrymen; but worn out at length with fruitless expectations, and dispirited with suffering hardships of which they faw no end, they, in despair, came to a resolution of committing themselves to the ocean on a float, rather than continue in that detestable abode. But, on the arrival of the vessel from Panama, they were transported with such joy, that all their sufferings were forgotten. Their hopes revived, and, with a rapid transition, not unnatural among men accustomed by their mode of life to sudden vicissitudes of fortune, high confidence succeeding to extreme dejection, Pizarro easily induced not only his own followers, but the crew of the vessel from Panama, to resume his former scheme with fresh ardour. Instead of returning to Panama, they flood towards the fouth-east, and more fortunate in this than in any of their past efforts, they, on the twentieth day after their departure from Gorgona, discovered the coast of Peru. After touching at several villages near the shore, which they found to be no wife inviting, they landed at Tumbez, a place of some note, about three degrees fouth of the line, distinguished for its stately temple, and a palace of the Incas or fovereigns of the country!. There the Spa-niards feasted their eyes with the first view of the opulence and civilization of the Peruvian em-pire. They beheld a country fully peopled, and cultivated with an appearance of regular industry; the natives decently clothed, and possessed of ingenuity so far surpassing the other inhabitants of the New World, as to have the use of tame domestic animals. But what chiefly attracted their notice, was fuch a show of gold and filver, not only in the ornaments of their persons and temples, but in several vessels and utenfils for common use, formed of those precious metals, as left no room to doubt that they abounded with profusion in the country. Pizarro and his companions feemed now to have attained to the completion of their most fanguine hopes, and fancied that all their wishes and dreams of rich domains, and inexhaustible trea-

fures, would foon be realized.

But with the flender force then under his command, Pizarro could only view the rich country of which he hoped hereafter to obtain possession. He ranged, however, for some time along the coast, maintaining every where a peaceable intercourse with the natives, no less aftonished at their new visitants, than the Spaniards were with the uniform appearance of opulence and cultivation which they beheld. [1527.] Having explored the country as far as was requilite to afcertain the importance of the discovery, Pizarro procured from the inhabitants fome of their Llamas or tame cattle, to which the Spaniards gave the name of sheep, some vessels of gold and filver, as well as fome specimens of their other works of ingenuity, and two young men, whom he proposed to instruct in the Castilian language, that they might ferve as in-terpreters in the expedition which he meditated. With these he arrived at Panama, towards the close of the third year from the time of his departure thence in. No adventurer of the age fuffered hardships or encountered dangers which equal those to which he was exposed during this long period. The patience with which he endured the one, and the fortitude with which he furmounted the other, exceed whatever is recorded in the history of the New World, where fo many romantic displays of those virtues

1528.]

m Herrera, dec. 3. lib. x. c. 3-6. dec. 4. lib. ii. c. 7, 8. Vega, 2. lib. i. c. 10-14. Zarate, lib. i. c. 2. Benzo, Hift. Nevi Orbis, lib. iii. c. 1.

1528.] Neither the splendid relation that Pizarro gave of the incredible opulence of the country which he had discovered, nor his bitter complaints on account of that unfeafouable recal of his forces, which had put it out of his power to attempt making any fettlement there, could move the governor of Panama to swerve from his former plan of conduct. He still contended, that the colony was not in a condition to invade fuch a mighty empire, and refused to authorise an expedition which he forefaw would be fo alluring that it might ruin the province in which he prefided, by an effort beyond its strength. His coldness, however, did not in any degree abate the ardour of the three affociates; but they perceived that they could not carry their scheme into execution without the countenance of fuperior authority, and must folicit their fovereign to grant that permission which they could not extort from his delegate. With this view, after adjusting among themselves that Pizarro should claim the station of governor, Almagro that of lieutenant-governor, and Luque the dignity of bishop in the country which they purposed to conquer, they sent Pizarro as their agent to Spain, though their fortunes were now so much exhausted by the repeated efforts which they had made, that they found some difficulty in borrowing the small sum requisite towards equipping him for the voyage ".

Pizarro lost no time in repairing to court, and new as the scene might be to him, he appeared before the emperor with the unembarrassed dignity of a man conscious of what his services

P Herrera, dec. 4. lib. iii. c. 1. Vega, 2. lib. i. c. 14. merited;

merited; and he conducted his negotiations with an infinuating dexterity of address, which could not have been expected either from his education or former habits of life. His feeling description of his own sufferings, and his pompous account of the country which he had discovered, confirmed by the specimens of its productions which he exhibited, made fuch an impression both on Charles and his ministers, that they not only approved of the intended expedition, but feemed to be interested in the success of its leader. Presuming on those dispositions in his favour, Pizarro paid little attention to the interest of his affociates. As the pretensions of Luque did not interfere with his own, he obtained for him the ecclefiaftical dignity to which he aspired. For Almagro, he claimed only the command of the fortress which should be erected at Tumbez. To himself he secured whatever his boundless ambition could defire. He was appointed [July 26] governor, captain-general, and adelantado of all the country which he had discovered, and hoped to conquer, with supreme authority, civil as well as military; and with full right to all the privileges and emoluments usually granted to adventurers in the New World. His jurisdiction was declared to extend two hundred leagues along the coast to the fouth of the river St. Jago; to be independent of the governor of Panama; and he had power to nominate all the officers who were to ferve under him. In return for those concessions, which cost the court of Spain nothing, as the enjoyment of them depended upon the success of Pizarro's own efforts, he engaged to raife two hundred and fifty men, and to provide the ships, arms, and warlike stores requisite towards subjecting, to the crown of Castile, the country of which the government was allotted him.

1529.] Inconsiderable as the body of men was which Pizarro had undertaken to raife, his funds and credit were fo low that he could hardly complete half the number; and after obtaining his patents from the crown, he was obliged to fteal privately out of the port of Seville, in order to elude the scrutiny of the officers who had it in charge to examine, whether he had fulfilled the stipulations in his contracto. Before his departure, however, he received fome fupply of money from Cortes, who having returned to Spain about this time, was willing to contribute his aid towards enabling an ancient companion, with whofe talents and courage he was well acquainted, to begin a career of glory similar to that which he himself had finished P.

He landed at Nombre de Dios, and marched across the isthmus to Panama, accompanied by his three brothers, Ferdinand, Juan, and Gonzalo, of whom the first was born in lawful wedlock, the two latter, like himself, were of illegitimate birth, and by Francisco de Alcantara, his mother's brother. They were all in the prime of life, and of such abilities and courage, as sitted them to take a distinguished part in his subsequent transactions.

1530.] On his arrival at Panama, Pizarro found Almagro fo much exasperated at the manner in which he had conducted his negotiation, that he not only refused to act any longer in concert with a man, by whose perfidy he had been excluded from the power and honours to which he had a just claim, but laboured to form a new affociation, in order to thwart or to rival his former confederate in his discoveries. Pizarro, however, had more wifdom and addrefs than to fuffer a rupture fo fatal to all his schemes, to become irreparable. By offering voluntarily to relinquish the office of adelantado, and promifing to concur in foliciting that title, with an independent government, for Almagro, he gradually mitigated the rage of an openhearted foldier, which had been violent, but was not implacable. Luque, highly fatisfied with having been successful in all his own pretenfions, cordially seconded Pizarro's endeavours. A reconciliation was effected; and the confederacy renewed on its original terms, that the enterprise should be carried on at the common expence of the affociates, and the profits accruing from it should be equally divided among them 9.

Herrera, dec. 4. lib. vii. c. 9.

P Ibid. c. 10.

1530

Even after their re-union, and the utmost efforts of their interest, three small vessels, with a hundred and eighty foldiers, thirty-fix of whom were horsemen, composed the armament which they were able to fit out. But the astonishing progress of the Spaniards in America had inspired them with such ideas of their own superiority, that Pizarro did not hesitate to fail with this contemptible force to invade a great empire. [1531, February.] Almagro was left at Panama, as formerly, to follow him with what reinforcement of men he should be able to muster. As the feafon for embarking was properly chosen, and the course of navigation between Panama and Peru was now better known, Pizarro completed the voyage in thirteen days; though, by the force of the winds and currents, he was carried above a hundred leagues to the north of Tumbez, the place of his destination, and obliged to land his troops in the bay of St. Matthew. Without losing a moment, he began to advance towards the fouth, taking care, however, not to depart far from the sea-shore, both that he which he expected from Panama, and fecure a retreat in case of any disaster, by keeping as near as possible to his ships. But as the country in several parts on the coast of Peru is barren, unhealthful, and thinly peopled; as the Spaniards had to pass all the rivers near their mouth, where the body of water is greatest; and as the imprudence of Pizarro, in attacking the natives when he should have studied to gain their confidence, had forced them to abandon their habitations; famine, fatigue, and diseases of various kinds, brought upon him and his followers calamities hardly inferior to those which they had endured in their former expedition. What they now experienced corresponded so ill with the alluring description of the country given by Pizarro, that many began to reproach him, and every foldier must have become cold to the fervice, if even in this unfertile region of Peru, they had not met with some appearances of wealth and cultivation which seemed to justify the report of their leader. At length they reached reached the province of Coaque [April 14]; and, having furprifed the principal fettlement of the natives, they feized their veffels and ornaments of gold and filver, to the amount of thirty thousand pelos, with other booty of fuch value, as dispelled all their doubts, and inspired the most desponding with sanguine hopes .

⁹ Herrera, dec 4. lib. vii. c. 9. Zarate, lib. i. c. 3. Vega, 2. lib. i. c. 14. VOL. II. forcement CC

Pizarro himself was so much delighted with this rich spoil, which he considered as the firstfruits of a land abounding with treasure, that he instantly dispatched one of his ships to Panama with a large remittance to Almagro; and another to Nicaragua with a confiderable fum to feveral persons of influence in that province, in hopes of alluring adventurers, by this early display of the wealth which he had acquired. Meanwhile, he continued his march along the coast, and disdaining to employ any means of reducing the natives but force, he attacked them with fuch violence in their scattered habitations, as compelled them either to retire into the interior country, or to fubmit to his yoke. This fudden appearance of invaders, whose aspect and manners were fo ftrange, and whose power feemed to be so irresistible, made the same dreadful impression as in other parts of America. Pizarro hardly met with refistance until he attacked the island of Puna in the bay of Guayquil. As that was better peopled than the country through which he had passed, and its inhabitants fiercer and less civilized than those of the continent, they defended themselves with fuch obstinate valour, that Pizarro spent fix months in reducing them to subjection. From Puna he proceeded to Tumbez, where the distempers which raged among his men compelled him to remain for three months. While he was thus employed, he began to reap advantage from his attention, to spread the fame of his first success at Coaque. Two different detachments arrived from Nicaragua [1532], which, though neither exceeded thirty men, he considered as a reinforcement of great consequence to his feeble band, especially as the one was under the command of Sebastian Benalcazar, and the other of Hernando Soto, officers not inferior in merit and reputation to any who had ferved in America. From Tumbez he proceeded to the river Piura [May 16], and in an advantageous station near the mouth of it, he established the first Spanish colony in Peru; to which he gave the name of St. Michael. As Pizarro continued to advance towards the center of the Peruvian empire, he gradually received more full information concerning its extent and policy, as well as the fituation of its affairs at that juncture. Without some knowledge of these, he could not have conducted his operations with propriety; and without a fuitable attention to them, it is impossible to account for the progress which the Spaniards had already made, or to unfold the causes of their subsequent success.

Herrera, dec. 4. lib. vii. c. 9. lib. ii. c. 1. Xerez, 182. CC2

At the time when the Spaniards invaded Peru, the dominions of its fovereigns extended

⁵ P. Sancho ap. Ramus. iii. p. 371, F. Herrera, dec. 4. lib. vii. c. 18. lib. ix. c. 1, Zarate, lib. ii. c. 2, 3. Xerez, p. 182, &c.

in length, from north to fouth, above fifteen hundred miles along the Pacific Ocean. Its breadth, from east to west, was much less confiderable; being uniformly bounded by the vast ridge of the Andes, stretching from its one extremity to the other. Peru, like the rest of the New World, was originally possessed by small independent tribes, differing from each other in manners, and in their forms of rude policy. All, however, were so little civilized, that, if the traditions concerning their mode of life, preserved among their descendants, deserve credit, they must be classed among the most unimproved favages of America. Strangers to every species of cultivation or regular industry, without any fixed residence, and unacquainted with those fentiments and obligations which form the first bonds of social union, they are faid to have roamed about naked in the forests, with which the country was then covered, more like wild beafts than like men. After they had ftruggled for feveral ages with the hardships and calamities which are inevitable in fuch a flate, and when no circumstance seemed to indicate the approach of any uncommon effort towards improvement, we are told that there appeared on the banks of the lake Titiaca, a man and woman of majestic form, and clothed in decent garments. They declared themselves to be children of the Sun, fent by their beneficent parent, who beheld with pity the miseries of the human race, to instruct and to reclaim them. At their persuasion, enforced by reverence for the divinity in whose name they were supposed to speak, several of the dispersed savages united together, and receiving their commands as heavenly injunctions, followed them to Cuzco, where they fettled, and began to lay the foundations of a city.

Manco Capac and Mama Ocollo, for fuch were the names of those extraordinary personages, having thus collected some wandering tribes, formed that focial union, which, by multiplying the defires, and uniting the efforts of the human species, excites industry, and leads to improvement. Manco Capac instructed the men in agriculture, and other useful arts. Mama Ocollo taught the women to spin and to weave. By the labour of the one fex, subsistence became less precarious; by that of the other, life was rendered more comfortable. After securing the objects of first necessity in an infant state, by providing food, raiment, and habitations, for the rude people of whom he took charge, Manco Capac turned his attention towards introducing fuch laws and policy as might perpetuate their happiness. By his institutions, which shall be more particularly explained hereafter, the various relations in private life were established, and the duties resulting from them prescribed with such propriety, as gradually formed a barbarous people to decency of manners. In public administration, the functions of persons in authority were fo precifely defined, and the fubordination of those under their jurisdiction maintained with fuch a steady hand, that the society in which he prefided, foon affumed the aspect of a regular and well-governed state.

Thus, according to the Indian tradition, was founded the empire of the Incas or Lords of Peru. At first its extent was small. The territory of Manco Capac did not reach above eight leagues from Cuzco. But within its narrow precincts he exercised absolute and uncontrolled authority. His fuccessors, as their dominions extended, arrogated a fimilar jurifdiction over the new subjects which they acquired; the despotism of Asia was not more complete. The Incas were not only obeyed as monarchs, but revered as divinities. Their blood was held to be facred, and, by prohibiting intermarriages with the people, was never contaminated by mixing with that of any other race. The family, thus separated from the rest of the nation, was distinguished by peculiarities in dress and ornaments, which it was unlawful for others to assume. The monarch himself appeared with enfigns of royalty referved for him alone; and received from his subjects marks of obsequious homage and respect, which approached almost to adoration.

But, among the Peruvians, this unbounded power of their monarchs feems to have been uniformly accompanied with attention to the good of their subjects. It was not the rage of conquest, if we may believe the accounts of their countrymen, that prompted the Incas to extend their dominions, but the desire of diffusing the blessings of civilization, and the knowledge of the arts which they possessed, among the barbarous people whom they reduced. During a succession of twelve monarchs, it is said that not one deviated from this beneficent character.

When

c. 4. dec. 5. lib. iii. c. 17.

When the Spaniards first visited the coast of Peru, in the year one thousand five hundred and twenty-six, Huana Capac, the twelfth monarch from the founder of the state, was seated on the throne. He is represented as a prince distinguished not only for the pacific virtues peculiar to the race, but eminent for his martial talents. By his victorious arms the kingdom of Quito was subjected, a conquest of such extent and importance as almost doubled the power of the Peruvian empire. He was fond of residing in the capital of that valuable province which he had added to his dominions; and, notwithstanding the ancient and fundamental law of the monarchy against polluting the royal blood by any foreign alliance, he married the daughter of the vanquished monarch of Quito. She bore him a fon named Atahualpa, whom, on his death at Quito, which feems to have happened about the year one thousand five hundred and twentynine, he appointed his fuccessor in that kingdom, leaving the rest of his dominions to Huascar, his eldest son, by a mother of the royal race. Greatly as the Peruvians revered the memory of a monarch who had reigned with greater reputation and splendour than any of his predecef-fors, the destination of Huana Capac concerning the fuccession, appeared so repugnant to a maxim coeval with the empire, and founded on authority deemed facred, that it was no fooner known at Cuzco than it excited general difgust. Encouraged by those fentiments of his fubjects, Huascar required his brother to renounce the government of Quito, and to acknowledge him as his lawful superior. But it had been the first care of Atahualpa to gain a large body of troops which had accompanied his father to Ouito. These were the flower of the Peruvian warriors, to whose valour Huana Capac had been indebted for all his victories. Relying on their support, Atahualpa first eluded his brother's demand, and then marched against him in hostile array.

care

Thus the ambition of two young men, the title of the one founded on ancient usage, and that of the other afferted by the veteran troops, involved Peru in civil war, a calamity to which, under a fuccession of virtuous princes, it had hitherto been a stranger. In such a contest the issue was obvious. The force of arms triumphed over the authority of laws. Atahualpa remained victorious, and made a cruel use of his victory. Conscious of the defect in his own title to the crown, he attempted to exterminate the royal race, by putting to death all the children of the Sun descended from Manco Capac, whom he could feize either by force or stratagem. From a political motive, the life of his unfortunate rival Huascar, who had been taken prisoner in a battle which decided the fate of the empire, was prolonged for fome time, that, by iffuing orders in his name, the usurper might more eatily establish his own authority ".

When Pizarro landed in the bay of St. Matthew, this civil war raged between the two brothers in its greatest fury. Had he made any hostile attempt in his former visit to Peru in the year one thousand five hundred and twenty-feven, he must then have encountered the force of a powerful state, united under a monarch, possessed of capacity as well as courage, and unembarrassed with any care that could divert him from opposing his progress. But at this time, the two competitors, though they received early accounts of the arrival and violent proceedings of the Spaniards, were so intent upon the operations of a war, which they deemed more interesting, that they paid no attention to the motions of an enemy, too inconsiderable in number to excite any great alarm, and to whom, it would be easy, as they imagined, to give a check when more at leisure.

^u Zarate, lib. i. c. 15. Vega, 1. lib. ix. c. 12 and 32-40. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. i. c. 2. lib. iii. c. 17.

By this fortunate coincidence of events, whereof Pizarro could have no forefight, and of which, from his defective mode of intercourse with the people of the country, he remained long ignorant, he was permitted to carry on his operations unmolested, and advanced to the centre of a great empire before one effort of its power was exerted to stop his career. During their progress, the Spaniards had acquired some imperfect knowledge of this struggle between the two contending factions. The first complete information with respect to it, they received from messengers whom Huascar sent to Pizarro, in order to solicit his aid against Atahualpa, whom he represented as a rebel and an usurper u. Pizarro perceived at once the importance of this intelligence, and forefaw so clearly all the advantages which might be derived from this divided state of the kingdom, which he had invaded, that, without waiting for the reinforcement which he expected from Panama, he determined to push forward, while intestine discord put it out of the power of the Peruvians to attack him with their whole force, and while, by taking part, as circumstances should incline him, with one of the competitors, he might be enabled with greater ease to crush both. Enterprising as the Spaniards of that age were in all their operations against Americans, and distinguished as Pizarro was among his countrymen for daring courage, we can hardly suppose, that after having proceeded hitherto slowly, and with much caution, he would have changed at once his system of operation, and have ventured upon a measure so hazardous, without some new motive or prospect to justify it.

As he was obliged to divide his troops, in order to leave a garrison in St. Michael, sufficient to defend a station of equal importance as a place of retreat in case of any disaster, and as a port for receiving any fupplies which should come from Panama, he began his march with a very flender and ill-accoutred train of followers. They confifted of fixty-two horsemen*, and a hundred and two foot-foldiers, of whom twenty were armed with crofs-bows, and three with muskets. He directed his course towards Caxamalca, a fmall town at the distance of twelve days march from St. Michael, where Atahualpa was encamped with a confiderable body of troops. Before he had proceeded far, an officer dispatched by the Inca met him with a valuable present from that prince, accompanied with a proffer of his alliance, and affurances of a friendly reception at Caxamalca. Pizarro, according to the usual artifice of his countrymen in America, pretended to come as the ambassador of a very powerful monarch, and declared that he was now advancing with an intention to offer Atahualpa his aid against those enemies who disputed his title to the throne y.

As the object of the Spaniards in entering their country was altogether incomprehensible to the Peruvians, they had formed various conjectures concerning it, without being able to decide whether they should consider their new guests as beings of a superior nature, who had visited them from some beneficent motive, or as formidable avengers of their crimes, and enemies to their repose and liberty. The continual professions of the Spaniards, that they came to enlighten them with the knowledge of truth, and lead them in the way of happiness, favoured the former opinion; the outrages which they committed, their rapaciousness and cruelty, were awful confirmations of the latter. While in this state of uncertainty, Pizarro's declaration of his pacific intentions fo far removed all the Inca's fears, that he determined to give him a friendly reception. In consequence of this resolution, the Spaniards were allowed to march in tranquillity across the fandy. desert between St. Michael and Motupe, where the most feeble effort of an enemy, added to the unavoidable distresses which they suffered in passing through that comfortless region, must have proved fatal to them 2. From Montupe they advanced towards the mountains which encompaffed the low country of Peru, and paffed through a defile so narrow and inaccessible, that a few men might have defended it against a numerous army. But here likewife, from the fame inconsiderate credulity of the Inca, the Spaniards met with no opposition, and took quiet possession of a fort erected for the security of that important station. As they now approached near to Caxamalca, Atahualpa renewed his professions of friendship; and as an evidence of their fincerity, fent them prefents of greater value than the former.

Y Herrera, dec. 5. lib. i, 5. 3. Xerez, p. 189. 2 See Note CXXIX.

On entering Caxamalca, Pizarro took pof-fession of a large court, on one side of which was a house which the Spanish historians call a palace of the Inca, and on the other a temple of the Sun, the whole furrounded with a strong rampart or wall of earth. When he had posted his troops in this advantageous station, he dispatched his brother Ferdinand and Hernando Soto to the camp of Atahualpa, which was about a league distant from the town. He instructed them to confirm the declaration which he had formerly made of his pacific disposition, and to desire an interview with the Inca, that he might explain more fully the intention of the Spaniards in visiting his country. They were treated with all the respectful hospitality usual among the Peruvians in the reception of their most cordial friends, and Atahualpa promised to visit the Spanish commander next day in his quarters. The decent deportment of the Peruvian monarch, the order of his court, and the reverence with which his fubjects approached his person and obeved VOL. II. DD obeyed his commands, aftonished those Spaniards, who had never met in America with any thing more dignished than the petty cazique of a barbarous tribe. But their eyes were still more powerfully attracted by the vast profusion of wealth which they observed in the Inca's camp. The rich ornaments worn by him and his attendants, the vessels of gold and silver in which the repast offered to them was served up, the multitude of utensils of every kind formed of those precious metals, opened prospects far exceeding any idea of opulence that a European of the fixteenth century could form.

On their return to Caxamalca, while their minds were yet warm with admiration and defire of the wealth which they had beheld, they gave fuch a description of it to their countrymen, as confirmed Pizarro in a resolution which he had already taken. From his own observation of American manners during his long fervice in the New World, as well as from the advantages; which Cortes had derived from feizing Montezuma, he knew of what consequence it, was to have the Inca in his power. For this purpose, he formed a plan as daring as it was perfidious. Notwithstanding the character that he had affumed of an ambassador from a powerful monarch, who courted an alliance with the Inca, and in violation of the repeated offers which he had made to him of his own friendship and affist-ance, he determined to avail himself of the unfuspicious simplicity with which Atahualpa relied on his professions, and to seize the person of the Inca during the interview to which he had invited him. He prepared for the execution of his his scheme with the same deliberate arrangement, and with as little compunction, as if it had reflected no difgrace on himfelf or his country. He divided his cavalry into three small squadrons, under the command of his brother Ferdinand, Soto, and Benalcazar; his infantry were formed in one body, except twenty of most tried courage, whom he kept near his own person to support him in the dangerous service which he reserved for himself; the artillery, consisting of two field-pieces a and the cross bowmen, were placed opposite to the avenue by which Atahualpa was to approach. All were commanded to keep within the square, and not to move until the fignal for action was

Buillio E

Early in the morning [Nov. 16] the Peruvian camp was all in motion. But as Atahualpa was folicitous to appear with the greatest splendour and magnificence in his first interview with the ftrangers, the preparations for this were fo tedious, that the day was far advanced before he began his march. Even then, lest the order of the procession should be deranged, he moved for lowly, that the Spaniards became impatient, and apprehensive that some suspicion of their intention might be the cause of this delay. In order to remove this, Pizarro dispatched one of his officers with fresh assurances of his friendly; disposition. At length the Inca approached. First of all appeared four hundred men, in an uniform dress, as harbingers to clear the way before him. He himself, sitting on a throne or couch, adorned with plumes of various colours, and almost covered with plates of gold and silver enriched with precious stones, was carried on the shoulders of his principal attendants. Behind him came some chief officers of his court, carried in the same manner. Several bands of singers and dancers accompanied this cavalcade; and the whole plain was covered with troops, amounting to more than thirty thousand men.

* Xerez, p. 194.

As the Inca drew near the Spanish quarters, father Vincent Valverde, chaplain to the expedition, advanced with a crucifix in one hand, and a breviary in the other, and in a long discourse explained to him the doctrine of the creation, the fall of Adam, the incarnation, the fufferings, and refurrection of Jesus Christ, the appointment of St. Peter as God's vicegerent on earth, the transmission of his apostolic power by succession to the popes, the donation made to the king of Castile by pope Alexander of all the regions in the New World. In consequence of all this, he required Atahualpa to embrace the Christian faith, to acknowledge the supreme jurisdiction of the pope, and to submit to the king of Castile as his lawful sovereign; promising, if he complied instantly with this requisition, that the Castilian monarch would protect his dominions, and permit him to continue in the exercise of his royal authority; but if he should impiously refuse to obey this fummons, he denounced war against him in his mafter's name, and threatened him with the most dreadful effects of his vengeance.

This strange harangue, unfolding deep mysteries, and alluding to unknown facts, of which no power of eloquence could have conveyed at once a distinct idea to an American, was so lamely translated by an unskilful interpreter, little acquainted with the idiom of the Spanish tongue, and incapable of expressing himself with propriety in the language of the Inca, that its general tenor was altogether incomprehensible to Atahualpa. Some parts in it, of more obvious meaning, filled him with aftonishment and indignation. His reply, however, was temperate. He began with observing, that he was lord of the dominious over which he reigned by hereditary fuccession; and added, that he could not conceive how a foreign prieft should pretend to dispose of territories which did not belong to him; that if such a preposterous grant had been made, he, who was the rightful possessor, refused to confirm it; that he had no inclination to renounce the religious institutions established by his ancestors; nor would he forfake the service of the Sun, the immortal divinity whom he and his people revered, in order to worship the God of the Spaniards, who was subject to death; that with respect to other matters contained in his discourse, as he had never heard of them before, and did not now understand their meaning, he defired to know where the priest had learned things so extraordinary. "In this book," answered Valverde, reaching out to him his breviary. The Inca opened it eagerly, and turning over the leaves, lifted it to his ear: "This," fays he, "is filent; it tells me nothing;" and threw it with difdain to the ground. The enraged monk, running towards his countrymen, cried out, "To arms, Christians, to arms; the word of God is insulted;

a diftinct

avenge this profanation on those impious

dogs P.

Pizarro, who, during this long conference, had with difficulty restrained his soldiers, eager to feize the rich spoils of which they had now so near a view, immediately gave the signal of affault. At once the martial music struck up, the cannon and muskets began to fire, the horse fallied out fiercely to the charge, the infantry rushed on sword in hand. The Peruvians, altonished at the suddenness of an attack which they did not expect, and dismayed with the destructive effect of the fire-arms, and the irrefiftible impression of the cavalry, sled with universal consternation on every side, without attempting either to annoy the enemy, or to defend themfelves. Pizarro, at the head of his chofen band, advanced directly towards the Inca; and though his nobles crowded around him with officious zeal, and fell in numbers at his feet, while they vied one with another in facrificing their own lives, that they might cover the facred person of their fovereign, the Spaniards foon penetrated to the royal feat; and Pizarro feizing the Inca by the arm, dragged him to the ground, and carried him as a prisoner to his quarters. The fate of the monarch increased the precipitate flight of his followers. The Spaniards purfued them towards every quarter, and with deliberate and unrelenting barbarity continued to flaughter wretched fugitives, who never once offered to resist. The carnage did not cease until the close of day. Above four thousand Peruvians were killed. Not a fingle Spaniard fell, nor was one

b See Note CXXX.

T. Swhard B.A.del!

C.Rivers sculp.

wounded but Pizarro himself, whose hand was slightly hurt by one of his own soldiers, while struggling eagerly to lay hold on the Inca c.

The plunder of the field was rich beyond any idea which the Spaniards had yet formed concerning the wealth of Peru, and they were fo transported with the value of the acquisition, as well as the greatness of their success, that they passed the night in the extravagant exultation natural to indigent adventurers on such an extraordinary change of fortune.

At first the captive monarch could hardly believe a calamity which he fo little expected to be real. But he foon felt all the mifery of his fate, and the dejection into which he funk was in proportion to the height of grandeur from which he had fallen. Pizarro, afraid of lofing all the advantages which he hoped to derive from the possession of such a prisoner, laboured to confole him with professions of kindness and respect, that corresponded ill with his actions. By refiding among the Spaniards, the Inca quickly discovered their ruling passion, which, indeed, they were nowise solicitous to conceal, and by applying to that, made an attempt to recover his liberty. He offered as a ranfom what aftonished the Spaniards, even after all they now knew concerning the opulence of his kingdom. The apartment in which he was confined was twenty-two feet in length and fixteen in breadth; he undertook to fill it with veffels of gold as high as he could reach. Pizarro closed eagerly with this tempting proposal, and a line was drawn upon the walls of the chamber, to mark the stipulated height to which the treasure was to rife.

Atahualpa, transported with having obtained fome prospect of liberty, took measures instantly for fulfilling his part of the agreement, by fending messengers to Cuzco, Quito, and other places, where gold had been amaffed in largest quantities, either for adorning the temples of the gods, or the houses of the Inca, to bring what was necessary for completing his ransom directly to Caxamalca. Though Atahualpa was now in the cultody of his enemies, yet so much were the Peruvians accustomed to respect every mandate iffued by their fovereign, that his orders. were executed with the greatest alacrity. Soothed with hopes of recovering his liberty by this means, the subjects of the Inca were afraid of endangering his life by forming any other scheme for his relief: and though the force of the empire was still entire, no preparations were made, and no army affembled to avenge their own wrongs or those of their monarch d. The Spaniards remained in Caxamalca tranquil and unmolested. Small detachments of their number marched into remote provinces of the empire, and, instead of meeting with any oppofition, were everywhere received with marks of the most submissive respect of his main body, if he had not about this time received an account of Almagro's having landed at St. Michael with fuch a reinforcement as would almost double the number of his followers f. The arrival of this long-expected fuccour was not more agreeable to the Spaniards, than alarming to the Inca. He saw the power of his enemies increase; and as he knew neither the fource whence they derived their supplies, nor the means by which they were conveyed to Peru, he could not foresee to what a height the inundation that poured in upon his dominions might rife. [1533.] While disquieted with such apprehensions, he learned that some Spaniards, in their way to Cuzco; had vifited his brother Huasca in the place where he kept him confined, and that the captive prince had reprefented to them the justice of his own cause, and as an inducement to espouse it, had promised them a quantity of treasure greatly beyond that which Atahualpa had engaged to pay for his ransom. If the Spaniards should listen to this propofal, Atahualpa perceived his own destruction to be inevitable; and suspecting that their infatiable thirst for gold would tempt them to lend a favourable ear to it, he determined to facrifice his brother's life, that he might fave his own; and his orders for this purpose were executed, like all his other commands, with ferupulous punctuality g.

Inconfiderable as those parties were, and defirous as Pizarro might be to obtain some knowledge of the interior state of the country, he could not have ventured upon any diminution

d Xerez, 205. CXXXII.

Meanwhile, Indians daily arrived at Caxamalca from different parts of the kingdom, loaded

f Xerez, 204. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. ili. c. 1, 2.

Zarate, lib. ii. c. 6. Gomara, Hist. c. 115. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. iii. c. 2.

11/11/11

with treasure. A great part of the stipulated quantity was now amassed, and Atahualpa asfured the Spaniards, that the only thing which prevented the whole from being brought in, was the remoteness of the provinces where it was deposited. But such vast piles of gold presented continually to the view of needy soldiers, had so inflamed their avarice, that it was impossible any longer to restrain their impatience to obtain possession of this rich booty. Orders were given for melting down the whole, except some pieces of curious fabric, reserved as a present for the emperor. After setting apart the fifth due to the crown, and a hundred thousand pelos as a donative to the foldiers which arrived with Almagro, their remained one million five hundred and twenty-eight thousand five hundred pelos to Pizarro and his followers. The festival of St. James [July 25], the patron saint of Spain, was the day chosen for the partition of this enormous sum, and the manner of conducting it strongly marks the strange alliance of fanaticism with avarice, which I have more than once had occasion to point out as a striking feature in the character of the conquerors of the New World. Though affembled to divide the fpoils of an innocent people, procured by deceit, extortion, and cruelty, the transaction began with a solemn invocation of the name of Godh, as if they could have expected the guidance of Heaven in distributing those wages of iniquity. In this division above eight thousand person, at that time not inferior in effective value to as many pounds sterling in the present century, fell to the share of each horseman, and half that sum to each foot soldier. Pizarro himself, and his officers, received dividends in proportion to the dignity of their rank.

h Herrera, dec. 5. lib. iii. c. 3.

There is no example in history of such a fudden acquisition of wealth by military service, nor was ever a fum fo great divided among fo fmall a number of foldiers. Many of them having received a recompence for their services far beyond their most fanguine hopes, were fo impatient to retire from fatigue and danger, in order to spend the remainder of their days in their native country, in eafe and opulence, that they demanded their discharge with clamorous importunity. Pizarro, fensible that from such men he could expect neither enterprise in action nor fortitude in fuffering, and perfuaded that wherever they went, the display of their riches would allure adventurers, less opulent but more hardy, to his standard, granted their suit without reluctance, and permitted above fixty of them to accompany his brother Ferdinand, whom he fent to Spain with an account of his fuccess, and the present destined for the emperori.

The Spaniards, having divided among them the treasure amassed for the Inca's ransom, he infifted with them to fulfil their promife of fetting him at liberty. But nothing was farther from Pizarro's thoughts. During his long fervice in the New World, he had imbibed those ideas and maxims of his fellow-foldiers, which led them to confider its inhabitants as an inferior race, neither worthy of the name, nor entitled to the rights of men. In his compact with Atahualpa, he had no other object than to amuse his captive with such a prospect of recovering his liberty, as might induce him to lend all the aid of his authority towards collecting the wealth of his kingdom. Having now accomplished this, he no longer regarded his plighted faith; and at the very time when the credulous prince hoped to be replaced on his throne, he had secretly resolved to bereave him of life. Many circumstances seem to have concurred in prompting him to this action, the most criminal and atrocious that stains the Spanish name, amidst all the deeds of violence committed in carrying on the conquest of the New World.

Herrera, dec. 5. lib. iii. c. 4. Vega, p. 2. lib. i. c. 38. Manney deck of Maris, or de

Though Pizarro had feized the Inca, in imitation of Cortes's conduct towards the Mexican monarch, he did not possess talents for carrying on the same artful plan of policy. Destitute of the temper and address requisite for gaining the confidence of his prifoner, he never reaped all the advantages which might have been derived from being master of his person and authority. Atahualpa was, indeed, a prince of greater abilities and difcernment than Montezuma, and feems to have penetrated more thoroughly into the character and intentions of the Spaniards. Mutual fuspicion and distrust accordingly took place be-tween them. The strict attention with which it was necessary to guard a captive of such importance, greatly increased the satigue of military duty. The utility of keeping him appeared inconfiderable; and Pizarro felt him as an incumbrance; from which he wished to be delivered k. Landing water of the sale of the land

^{*} Herrera, dec. 5. lib. iii. c. 4.

Almagro and his followers had made a demand of an equal share in the Inca's ransom; and though Pizarro had bestowed upon the private men the large gratuity which I have mentioned, and endeavoured to soothe their leader by prefents of great value, they still continued distaits fied. They were apprehensive, that as long as Atahualpa remained a prisoner, Pizarro's soldiers would apply whatever treasure should be acquired, to make up what was wanting of the quantity stipulated for his ransom, and under that pretext exclude them from any part of it. They insisted eagerly on putting the Inca to death, that all the adventurers in Peru might thereafter be on an equal footing 1.

Pizarro himself began to be alarmed with accounts of forces affembling in the remote provinces of the empire, and suspected Atahualpa of having issued orders for that purpose. These fears and fufpicions were artfully increased by Philippillo, one of the Indians whom Pizarro had carried off from Tumbez in the year one thousand five hundred and twenty-seven, and whom he employed as an interpreter. The function which he performed admitting this man to familiar intercourse with the captive monarch, he prefumed, notwithstanding the meanness of his birth, to raise his affections to a Coya, or defcendant of the Sun, one of Atahualpa's wives; and feeing no prospect of gratifying that passion during the life of the monarch, he endeavoured to fill the ears of the Spaniards with fuch accounts of the Inca's fecret defigns and preparations, as might awaken their jealoufy, and incite them to cut him off.

VOL. II.

Zarate, lib. ii. c. 7. Vega, p. 2. lib. i. c. 7. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. iii. c. 4.

3 7 NET

While Almagro and his followers openly demanded the life of the Inca; and Philippillo laboured to ruin him by private machinations, that unhappy prince inadvertently contributed to hasten his own fate. During his confinement he had attached himself with peculiar affection to Ferdinand Pizarro and Hernando Soto; who, as they were persons of birth and education fuperior to the rough adventurers with whom they ferved, were accustomed to behave with more decency and attention to the captive monarch. Soothed with this respect from persons of fuch high rank, he delighted in their fociety. But in the presence of the governor he was always uneafy and overawed. This dread foon came to be mingled with contempt. Among all the European arts, what he admired most was that of reading and writing; and he long deliberated with himself, whether he should regard it as a natural or acquired talent. In order to determine this, he defired one of the foldiers, who guarded him, to write the name of God on the nail of his thumb. This he shewed succesfively to feveral Spaniards, asking its meaning; and to his amazement, they all, without hesitation, returned the same answer. At length Pizarro entered; and on presenting it to him, he blushed, and with some confusion was obliged to acknowledge his ignorance. From that mo-ment, Atahualpa confidered him as a mean perfon, less instructed than his own foldiers; and he had not address enough to conceal the fentiments with which this discovery inspired him.

To be the object of a barbarian's fcorn, not only mortified the pride of Pizarro, but excited fuch refentment in his breast, as added force to all the other considerations which prompted him to put the Inca to death m.

But in order to give some colour of justice to this violent action, and that he himself might be exempted from standing fingly responsible for the commission of it, Pizarro resolved to try the Inca with all the formalities observed in the criminal courts of Spain. Pizarro himfelf, and Almagro, with two affiftants, were appointed judges, with full power to acquit or to condemn; an attorney-general was named to carry on the profecution in the king's name; counfellors were chosen to affist the prisoner in his defence; and clerks were ordained to record the proceedings of court. Before this strange tri-bunal, a charge was exhibited still more amazing. It confifted of various articles; that Atahualpa, though a bastard, had dispossessed the rightful owner of the throne, and usurped the regal power; that he had put his brother and lawful fovereign to death; that he was an idolater, and had not only permitted, but commanded the offering of human facrifices; that he had a great number of concubines; that fince his imprison-ment he had wasted and embezzled the royal treasures which now belonged of right to the conquerors; that he had incited his subjects to take arms against the Spaniards. On these heads of accusation, some of which are so ludicrous, others fo abfurd, that the effrontery of Pizarro,

in

m Herrera, dec. 5. lib. iii. c. 4. Vega, p. 11. lib. i. c. 38.

in making them the foundation of a serious procedure, is not less surprising than his injustice, did this strange court go on to try the sovereign of a great empire, over whom it had no jurisdiction. With respect to each of the articles, witnesses were examined; but as they delivered their evidence in their native tongue, Philippillo had it in his power to give their words whatever turn best suited his malevolent intentions. To judges predetermined in their opinion, this evidence appeared sufficient. They pronounced Atahualpa guilty, and condemned him to be burnt alive. Friar Valverde profittuted the authority of his facred function to confirm this fentence, and by his fignature warranted it to be just. Astonished at his fate, Atahualpa endeavoured to avert it by tears, by promises, and by entreaties, that he might be fent to Spain, where a monarch would be the arbiter of his lot. But pity never touched the unfeeling heart of Pizarro. He ordered him to be led infantly to execution; and, what added to the bitterness of his last moments, the same monk who had just ratified his doom, offered to confole, and attempted to convert him. The most powerful argument Valverde employed to prevail with him to embrace the Christian faith, was a promise of mitigation in his punishment. The dread of a cruel death extorted from the trembling victim a defire of receiving baptism. The ceremony was performed; and Atahualpa, instead of being burnt, was strangled at the stake ".

n Zarate, lib. ii. c 7. Xerez, p. 233. Vega, p. 116. lib. i. c. 36, 37. Gomara, Hist. c. 117. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. iii. c. 4.

Happily for the credit of the Spanish nation. even among the profligate adventurers which it fent forth to conquer and defolate the New World, there were perfons who retained fome tincture of the Castilian generosity and honour. Though, before the trial of Atahualpa, Ferdinand Pizarro had fet out for Spain, and Soto was fent on a separate command at a distance from Caxamalca, this odious transaction was not carried on without censure and opposition. Several officers, and among those some of the greatest reputation and most respectable families in the service, not only remonstrated, but protested against this measure of their general, as disgraceful to their country, as repugnant to every maxim of equity, as a violation of public faith, and an usurpation of jurisdiction over an independent monarch, to which they had no title. But their laudable endeavours were vain. Numbers, and the opinion of fuch as held every thing to be lawful which they deemed advanta-geous, prevailed. History, however, records even the unfuccessful exertions of virtue with applause; and the Spanish writers, in relating events where the valour of their nation is more conspicuous than its humanity, have not failed to preferve the names of those who made this laudable effort to fave their country from the infamy of having perpetrated fuch a crime o.

On the death of Atahualpa, Pizarro invested one of his sons with the ensigns of royalty, hoping that a young man without experience might prove a more passive instrument in his hands, than an ambitious monarch, who had been accustomed to independent command. The people of Cuzco, and the adjacent country, acknowledged Manco Capac, a brother of Huafcar, as Inca P. But neither possessed the authority which belonged to a fovereign of Peru. The violent convulsions into which the empire had been thrown, first by the civil war between the two brothers, and then by the invalion of the Spaniards, had not only deranged the order of the Peruvian government, but almost dissolved its frame. When they beheld their monarch a captive in the power of strangers, and at last suffering an ignominious death, the people in feveral provinces, as if they had been let free from every restraint of law and decency, broke out into the most licentious excesses 9. So many defcendants of the Sun, after being treated with the utmost indignity, had been cut off by Atahualpa, that not only their influence in the state diminished with their number, but the accustomed reverence for that facred race fenfibly decreafed. In .consequence of this state of things, ambitious men in different parts of the empire afpired to independent authority, and usurped jurisdiction to which they had no title. The general who commanded for Atahualpa in Quito, seized the brother and children of his master, put them to a cruel death, and disclaiming any connection with either Inca, endeavoured to eftablish a separate kingdom for himself.

Vega, p. 11. lib. i. c. 37. Xerez, i. 235. Herrera, dec. 5 lib. iii. c. 5.

P Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 7. lib. ii. c. 12. lib. iii. c. 5. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 3, 4.

Herrera, dec. 5.
Zarate, lib. ii. c. 8.

The Spaniards, with pleasure, beheld the spirit of discord dissuling itself, and the vigour of government relaxing among the Peruvians. They considered those disorders as symptoms of a state hastening towards its dissolution. Pizarro no longer hefitated to advance towards Cuzco, and he had received such considerable reinforcements, that he could venture, with little danger, to penetrate fo far into the interior part of the country. The account of the wealth acquired at Caxamalca operated as he had foreseen. No fooner did his brother Ferdinand, with the officers and foldiers to whom he had given their discharge after the partition of the Inca's ransom, arrive at Panama, and display their riches in the view of their aftonished countrymen, than fame spread the account with such exaggeration through all the Spanish settlements on the South Sea, that the governors of Guatimala, Panama, and Nicaragua, could hardly restrain the people under their jurisdiction, from abandoning their possessions, and crowding to that inexhaustible source of wealth which seemed to be opened in Perus. In spite of every check and regulation, fuch numbers reforted thither, that Pizarro began his march at the head of five hundred men, after leaving a confiderable garrison in St. Michael, under the command of Benalcazar. The Peruvians had affembled fome large bodies of troops to oppose his progress. Several fierce encounters happened. But they terminated like all the actions in America; a few Spaniards were killed or wounded; the natives were put to flight with incredible flaughter. At length Pizarro forced his way to Cuzco, and took quiet possession of that capital. The riches found there, even after all that the natives had carried off and concealed, either from a superstitious veneration for the ornaments of their temples, or out of hatred to their rapacious conquerors, exceeded in value what had been received as Atahualpa's ransom. But as the Spaniards were now accustomed to the wealth of the country, and it came to be parcelled out among a greater number of adventurers, this dividend did not excite the same surprise, either from novelty, or the largeness of the sum that fell to the share of each individual.

S Gomara, Hist. c. 125. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. i. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. iii. c. 5.

During the march to Cuzco, that fon of Atahualpa whom Pizarro treated as Inca, died; and as the Spaniards substituted no person in his place, the title of Manco Capac seems to have been univerfally recognized u.

While his fellow-foldiers were thus employed, Benalcazar, governor of St. Michael, an able and enterprifing officer, was ashamed of remaining inactive, and impatient to have his name distinguished among the discoverers and conquerors of the New World. The seasonable arrival of a fresh body of recruits from Panama and Nicaragua, put it in his power to gratify this passion. Leaving a sufficient force to protect the infant settlement entrusted to his care, he placed himself at the head of the rest, and set out to attempt the reduction of Quito, where, according to the report of the natives, Atahualpa had left the greatest part of his treasure.

See Note CXXXIII. "Herrera, dec. 5. lib. v. c. 2.

Notwith-

SOR OTHER

Notwithstanding the distance of that city from St. Michael, the difficulty of marching through a mountainous country covered with woods, and the frequent and fierce attacks of the best troops in Peru, commanded by a skilful leader, the valour, good conduct, and perseverance of Benalcazar furmounted every obstacle, and he entered Quito with his victorious troops. But they met with a cruel mortification there. The natives, now acquainted, to their forrow, with the predominant passion of their invaders, and knowing how to disappoint it, had carried off all those treasures, the prospect of which had prompted them to undertake this arduous expedition, and had supported them under all the dangers and hardships wherewith they had to struggle in carrying it on *...

Benalcazar was not the only Spanish leader who attacked the kingdom of Quito. The fame of its riches attracted a more powerful enemy. Pedro de Alvarado, who had distinguished himself so eminently in the conquest of Mexico, having obtained the government of Guatimala as a recompence for his valour, soon became disgusted with a life of uniform tranquillity, and longed to be again engaged in the bustle of military service. The glory and wealth acquired by the conquerors of Peru heightened this passion, and gave it a determined direction. Believing, or pretending to believe, that the kingdom of Quito did not lie within the limits of the province allotted to Pizarro, he resolved to invade it. The high reputation of the commander al-

^{*} Zarate, lib. ii. c. 9. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 9. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. iv. c. 11, 12. lib. v. c. 2, 3. lib. vi, c. 3.

lured volunteers from every quarter. He'em. barked with five hundred men, of whom above two hundred were of fuch distinction as to serve on horseback. He landed at Puerto Viejo, and without sufficient knowledge of the country, or proper guides to conduct him, attempted to march directly to Quito, by following the course of the river Guayquil, and croffing the ridge of the Andes towards its head. But in this route, one of the most impracticable in all America, his troops endured fuch fatigue in forcing their way through forests and marshes on the low grounds, and suffered so much from excessive cold when they began to ascend the mountains, that before they reached the plain of Quito, a fifth part of the men and half of their horses died, and the rest were so much dispirited and worn out, as to be almost unfit for service y. There they met with a body, not of Indians but of Spaniards, drawn up in hostile array against them. Pizarro having received an account of Alvarado's armament, had detached Almagro with some troops to oppose this formidable in vader of his jurisdiction; and these were joined by Benalcazar and his victorious party. Alvarado, though furprifed at the fight of enemies whom he did not expect, advanced boldly to the charge. But by the interpolition of some moderate men in each party, an amicable accommodation took place; and the fatal period, when Spaniards suspended their conquests to embrue their hands in the blood of their countrymen, was postponed a few years. Alvarado engaged to return to his government, upon Almagro's paying him a hundred thousand pefos to defray the expence of his armament. Most of his followers remained in the country; and an expedition, which threatened Pizarro and his colony with ruin, contributed to augment its

Rrength 2.
[1534.] By this time Ferdinand Pizarro had landed in Spain. The immense quantities of gold and filver which he imported2, filled the kingdom with no less astonishment than they had excited in Panama and the adjacent provinces. Pizarro was received by the emperor with the attention due to the bearer of a prefent so rich, as to exceed any idea which the Spaniards had formed concerning the value of their acquifitions in America, even after they had been ten years mafters of Mexico. In recompence of his brother's fervices, his authority was confirmed with new powers and privileges, and the addition of feventy leagues, extending along the coast, to the fouthward of the territory granted in his former patent. Almagro received the honours which he had fo long defired. The title of Adelantado, or governor, was conferred upon him, with jurifdiction over two hundred leagues of country, firetching beyond the fouthern limits of the province allotted to Pizarro. Ferdinand himself did not go unrewarded. He was ad-mitted into the military order of St. Jago, a dif-tinction always acceptable to a Spanish gentle-man, and soon set out on his return to Peru, ² Zarate, lib. ii. c. 10-13. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 1, 2. 9. &c. Gomara, Hift. c. 126, &c. Remefal, Hift. Guatimal, lib. iii. c. 6. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. vi. c. 1, 2. 7, &.

accompanied by many persons of higher rank than had yet served in that country b. Some account of his negotiations reached Peru before he arrived there himself. Almagro no sooner learned that he had obtained the royal grant of an independent government, than, pretending that Cuzco, the imperial residence of the Incas, lay within its boundaries, he attempted to render himself master of that important station. Juan and Gonzalez Pizarro prepared to oppose him. Each of the contending parties was supported by powerful adherents, and the dispute was on the point of being terminated by the fword, when Francis Pizarro arrived in the capital. The reconciliation between him and Almagro had never been cordial. The treachery of Pizarro in engroffing to himself all the honours and emoluments which ought to have been divided with his affociate, was always present in both their thoughts. The former, conscious of his own perfidy, did not expect forgiveness; the latter, feeling that he had been deceived, was impatient to be avenged; and though avarice and ambition had induced them not only to difsemble their sentiments, but even to act in concert while in pursuit of wealth and power, no fooner did they obtain possession of these, than the same passions which had formed this temporary union, gave rife to jealoufy and discord. To each of them was attached a small band of interested dependents, who, with the malicious art peculiar to fuch men, heightened their fuf-picions, and magnified every appearance of offence. But with all those seeds of enmity in their minds, and thus affiduously cherished, each was so thoroughly acquainted with the abilities and courage of his rival, that they equally dreaded the consequences of an open rupture. The fortunate arrival of Pizarro at Cuzco, and the address mingled with firmness which he manifested in his exposulations with Almagro and his partisans, averted that evil for the present. A new reconciliation took place; the chief article of which was, that Almagro should attempt the conquest of Chili; and if he did not find in that province an establishment adequate to his merit and expectations, Pizarro, by way of indemnification, should yield up to him a part of Peru. This new agreement, though confirmed [June 12] with the same facred solemnities as their first contract, was observed with as little fidelity.

fence

Berrera, dec. 5. lib. vi. c. 13. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 19.

Soon after he concluded this important transaction, Pizarro marched back to the countries on the sea-coast, and as he now enjoyed an interval of tranquillity, undisturbed by any enemy, either Spanish or Indian, he applied himself with that persevering ardour, which distinguishes his character, to introduce a form of regular government into the extensive provinces subject to his authority. Though ill qualified by his education to enter into any disquisition concerning the principles of civil policy, and little accustomed by his former habits of life to attend to its arrangements, his natural sagacity supplied the want both of science and experience. He distributed the country into various districts; he

E Zarate, lib. ii. c. 13. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 19. Benzo, lib. iii. c. 6. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. vii. c. 8. VOL. 11. FF appointed appointed proper magistrates to preside in each; and established regulations concerning the administration of justice, the collection of the royal revenue, the working of the mines, and the treatment of the Indians, extremely fimple, but well calculated to promote the public prosperity. But though, for the prefent, he adapted his plan to the infant state of his colony, his afpiring mind looked forward to its future grandeur. He considered himself as laying the foundation of a great empire, and deliberated long, and with much solicitude, in what place he should fix the seat of government. Cuzco, the Imperial city of the Incas, was fituated in a corner of the empire, above four hundred miles from the fea, and much farther from Quito, a province of whose value he had formed an high idea. No other fettlement of the Peruvians was fo confiderable as to merit the name of a town, or to allure the Spaniards to fix their residence in it. But, in marching through the country, Pizarro had been struck with the beauty and fertility of the value of Rimac, one of the most extensive and best cultivated in Peru. There, on the banks of a small river, of the fame name with the vale which it waters and enriches, at the distance of fix miles from Callao, the most commodious harbour in the Pacific Ocean, he founded a city which he destined to be the capital of his government. He gave it the name of Ciudad de los Reyes, either from the circumstance of having laid the first stone [Jan. 18, 1535], at that feafon when the church celebrates the festival of the Three Kings, or, as is more probable, in honour of Juana and Charles, the joint fovereigns of Castile. This name it still retains among the Spaniards, in all legal and formal deeds; but it is better known to foreigners by that of Lima, a corruption of the ancient appellation of the valley in which it is fituated. Under his infpection, the buildings advanced with fuch rapidity, that it foon assumed the form of a city, which, by a magnificent palace that he erected for himself, and by the stately houses built by several of his officers, gave, even in its infancy, some indication of its subsequent grandeur.

Lui ronges

In consequence of what had been agreed with Pizarro, Almagro began his march towards Chili; and as he possessed in an eminent degree the virtues most admired by soldiers, boundless liberality and fearless courage, his standard was sollowed by sive hundred and seventy men, the greatest body of Europeans that had hitherto been assembled in Peru. From impatience to sinish the expedition, or from that contempt of hardship and danger acquired by all the Spaniards who had served long in America, Almagro, inflead of advancing along the level country on the coaft, chose to march across the mountains by a route that was shorter indeed, but almost impracticable. In this attempt his troops were exposed to every calamity which men can fuffer, from fatigue, from famine, and from the rigour of the climate in those elevated regions of the torrid zone, where the degree of cold is hardly inferior to what is felt within the polar circle. Many of them perished; and the survivors, when they descended into the fertile plains of Chili, had new difficulties to encounter. They found

d Herrera, dec. 5. lib. vi. c 12. lib. vii. c. 13. Calancho Coronica, lib. i. c. 37. Barneuvo, Lima fundata, ii. 294.

there a race of men very different from the people of Peru, intrepid, hardy, independent, and in their bodily constitution, as well as vigour of spirit, nearly resembling the warlike tribes in North America. Though filled with wonder at the first appearance of the Spaniards, and still more assonished at the operations of their cavalry and the effects of their fire-arms, the Chilese foon recovered to far from their furprife, as not only to defend themselves with obstinacy, but to attack their new enemies with more determined fierceness than any American nation had hitherto discovered. The Spaniards, however, continued to penetrate into the country, and collected fome confiderable quantities of gold; but were fo far from thinking of making any fettlement amidst such formidable neighbours, that, in spite of all the experience and valour of their leader, the final issue of the expedition still remained extremely dubious, when they were recalled from it by an unexpected revolution in Perue. The causes of this important event I shall endeavour to trace to their source.

So many adventurers had flocked to Peru from every Spanish colony in America, and all with such high expectations of accumulating independent fortunes at once, that, to men possessed with notions so extravagant, any mention of acquiring wealth gradually, and by schemes of patient industry, would have been not only a disappointment, but an insult. In order to find occupation for men who could not with safety be allowed to remain inactive, Pizarro encouraged

lib. ii. c. 20. Ovaile, Hist. de Chile, lib. iv. c. 15, &c. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. vi. c. 9. lib. x. c. 1, &c.

raged fome of the most distinguished officers who had lately joined him, to invade different provinces of the empire, which the Spaniards had not hitherto vifited. Several large bodies were formed for this purpose; and about the time that Almagro set out for Chili, they marched into remote districts of the country. No fooner did Manco Capac, the Inca, observe the inconsiderate security of the Spaniards in thus dispersing their troops, and that only a handful of soldiers remained in Cuzco, under Juan and Gonzalez Pizarro, than he thought that the happy period was at length come for vindicating his own rights, for avenging the wrongs of his country, and extirpating its oppressors. Though strictly watched by the Spaniards, who allowed him to reside in the palace of his ancestors at Cuzco, he found means of communicating his scheme to the persons who were to be entrusted with the execution of it: Among people accustomed to revere their fove-reign as a divinity, every hint of his will carries the authority of a command; and they themfelves were now convinced, by the daily increase in the number of their invaders, that the fond hopes which they had long entertained of their voluntary departure were altogether vain. All perceived that a vigorous effort of the whole nation was requisite to expel them, and the pre-parations for it were carried on with the secrecy and filence peculiar to Americans.

After some unsuccessful attemps of the Inca to make his escape, Ferdinand Pizarro happening to arrive at that time in Cuzco [1536], he obtained permission from him to attend a great festival which was to be celebrated a few leagues from the capital. Under pretext of that folemnity, the great men of the empire were afsembled. As foon as the Inca joined them, the standard of war was erected; and in a short time all the fighting men, from the confines of Quito to the frontier of Chili, were in arms. Many Spaniards, living fecurely on the fettlements allotted them, were massacred. Several detachments, as they marched carelefsly through a country which feemed to be tamely fubmiffive to their dominion, were cut off to a man. An army amounting (if we may believe the Spanish writers) to two hundred thousand men, attacked Cuzco, which the three brothers endeavoured to defend with only one hundred and feventy Spaniards. Another formidable body invested Lima, and kept the governor closely shut up. There was no longer any communication between the two cities; the numerous forces of the Peruvians spreading over the country, intercepted every messenger; and as the parties in Cuzco and Lima were equally unacquainted with the fate of their countrymen, each boded the worst concerning the other, and imagined that they themselves were the only persons who had survived the general extinction of the Spanish name in Peru d.

FF3

festival

It was at Cuzco, where the Inca commanded in person, that the Peruvians made their chief effort. During nine months they carried on the

d Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 28. Zarate, lib. iii. c. 3. Cieca de Leon, c. 82. Gomara, Hist. c. 135. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. viii. c. 5.

fiege with incessant ardour, and in various forms; and though they displayed not the same un-daunted ferocity as the Mexican warriors, they conducted some of their operations in a manner which discovered greater sagacity, and a genius more susceptible of improvement in the military art. They not only observed the advantages which the Spaniards derived from their discipline and their weapons, but they endeavoured to imitate the former, and turn the latter against them. They armed a considerable body of their bravest warriors with the swords, the spears, and bucklers, which they had taken from the Spanish soldiers whom they had cut off in different parts of the country. These they endeavoured to marshal in that regular compact order, to which experience had taught them that the Spaniards were indebted for their irrefiltible force in action. Some appeared in the field with Spanish muskets, and had acquired skill and resolution enough to use them. A few of the boldest, among whom was the Inca himself, were mounted on the horfes which they had taken, and advanced briskly to the charge like Spanish cavaliers, with their lances in the rest. It was more by their numbers, however, than by those imperfect essays to imitate European arts and to employ European arms, that the Peruvians annoyed the Spaniards. In spite of the valour, heightened by despair, with which the three brothers defended Cuzco, Manco Capac recovered possession of one half of his capital; and in their various efforts to drive him out of it, the Spaniards lost Juan Pizarro, the best beloved of all the brothers, together with some other persons of note. Worn out with the fatigue of incessant duty, distressed with want of provisions, and despairing of being able any longer to resist an enemy whose numbers daily increased, the soldiers became impatient to abandon Cuzco, in hopes either of joining their countrymen, if any of them yet survived, or of forcing their way to the sea, and sinding some means of escaping from a country which had been so fatal to the Spanish name. While they were brooding over those desponding thoughts, which their officers laboured in vain to dispel, Almagro appeared suddenly in the neighbourhood of Cuzco.

See NOTE CXXXVI.

The accounts transmitted to Almagro concerning the general infurrection of the Peruvians, were fuch as would have induced him, without hesitation, to relinquish the conquest of Chili, and hasten to the aid of his countrymen. But in this resolution he was confirmed by a motive less generous, but more interesting. By the same messenger who brought him intelligence of the Inca's revolt, he received the royal patent creating him governor of Chili, and defining the limits of his jurisdiction. Upon considering the tenor of it, he deemed it manifest beyond contradiction, that Cuzco lay within the boundaries of his government, and he was equally folicitous to prevent the Peruvians from recovering possession of their capital, and to wrest it out of the hands of the Pizarros. From impatience to accomplish both, he ventured to return by a new route; and in marching through the fandy plains on the coast, he suffered, from heat and drought, calamities of a new species, hardly inferior to those in which he had been involved by cold and famine on the fummits of the Andes.

Herrera, dec. 5. lib. viii. c. 4.

His arrival at Cuzco [1537] was in a critical moment. The Spaniards and Peruvians fixed their eyes upon him with equal folicitude. The former, as he did not study to conceal his pretensions, were at a loss whether to welcome him as a deliverer, or to take precautions against him as an enemy. The latter, knowing the points in contest between him and his countrymen, flattered themselves that they had more to hope than to dread from his operations. Almagro himself, unacquainted with the detail of the events which had happened in his absence, and folicitous to learn the precise posture of affairs, advanced towards the capital flowly, and with great circumspection. Various negotiations with both parties were fet on foot. The Inca conducted them on his part with much address. At first he endeavoured to gain the friendship of Almagro; and after many fruitless overtures, despairing of any cordial union with a Spaniard, he attacked him by furprise with a numerous body of chosen troops. But the Spanish disci-pline and valour maintained their wonted superiority. The Peruvians were repulsed with such flaughter, that a great part of their army difperfed, and Almagro proceeded to the gates of Cuzco without interruption.

The Pizarros, as they had no longer to make head against the Peruvians, directed all their attention towards their new enemy, and took measures to obstruct his entry into the capital.

Prudence, however, restrained both parties for some time from turning their arms against one another, while surrounded by common enemies, who would rejoice in the mutual slaughter. Different schemes of accommodation were proposed. Each endeavoured to deceive the other, or to corrupt his followers. The generous, open, affable temper of Almagro gained many adherents of the Pizarros, who were disgusted with their harsh domineering manners. Encouraged by this defection, he advanced towards the city by night, surprised the centinels, or was admitted by them, and investing the house where the two brothers resided, compelled them, after an obstinate defence, to surrender at discretion. Almagro's claim of jurisdiction over Cuzco was universally acknowledged, and a form of administration established in his name s.

Two or three perfons only were killed in this first act of civil hostility; but it was soon followed by scenes more bloody. Francis Pizarro having dispersed the Peruvians who had invested Lima, and received some considerable reinforcements from Hispaniola and Nicaragua, ordered sive hundred men, under the command of Alonso de Alvarado, to march to Cuzco, in hopes of relieving his brothers, if they and their garrison were not already cut off by the Peruvians. This body, which, at that period of the Spanish power in America, must be deemed a considerable force, advanced near to the capital before they knew that they had any enemy more formidable than Indians to encounter, S'Zarate, lib. iii. c. 4. Vega, p. 11 lib. ii. c. 29. 31. Gomara, Hist. c. 134. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. ii. c. 1-5.

It was with aftonishment that they beheld their countrymen posted on the banks of the river Abancay to oppose their progress. Almagro, however, wished rather to gain than to conquer them, and by bribes and promises endeavoured to seduce their leader. The sidelity of Alvarado remained unshaken; but his talents for war were not equal to his virtue. Almagro amused him with various movements, of which he did not comprehend the meaning, while a large detachment of chosen soldiers passed the river by night [July 12], fell upon his camp by surprise, broke his troops before they had time to form, and took him prisoner, together with his principal officers h.

By the fudden rout of this body, the contest between the two rivals must have been decided, if Almagro had known as well how to improve as how to gain a victory. Rodrigo Orgognez, an officer of great abilities, who having ferved under the constable Bourbon, when he led the Imperial army to Rome, had been accustomed to bold and decifive measures, advised him instantly to issue orders for putting to death Ferdinand and Gonzalo Pizarros, Alvarado, and a few other persons whom he could not hope to gain, and to march directly with his victorious troops to Lima, before the governor had time to prepare for his defence. But Almagro, though he discerned at once the utility of the counsel, and though he had courage to have carried it into execution, fuffered himself to be influenced by fentiments unlike those of a foldier of fortune grown old in fervice, and by scruples which suited not the chief of a party who had drawn his sword in civil war. Feelings of humanity restrained him from shedding the blood of his opponents; and the dread of being deemed a rebel, deterred him from entering a province which the king had allotted to another. Though he knew that arms must terminate the dispute between him and Pizarro, and resolved not to shun that mode of decision, yet, with a timid delicacy preposterous at such a juncture, he was so solicitous that his rival should be considered as the aggressor, that he marched quietly back to Cuzco, to wait his approach i.

Lib. ii. c 32.34. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. ii. c 9.

Pizarro was still unacquainted with all the interesting events which had happened near Cuzco. Accounts of Almagro's return, of the lofs of the capital, of the death of one brother, of the imprisonment of the other two, and of the defeat of Alvarado, were brought to him at once. Such a tide of misfortunes almost overwhelmed a spirit which had continued firm and erect under the rudest shocks of adversity. But the necesfity of attending to his own fafety, as well as the defire of revenge, preserved him from finking under it. He took measures for both with his wonted fagacity. As he had the command of the fea-coaft, and expected confiderable fupplies both of men and military stores, it was no less his interest to gain time, and to avoid action, than it was that of Almagro to precipitate operations, and bring the contest to a speedy iffue. He had recourse to arts which he had formerly practifed with fuccess, and Alma-

i Herrera, dec. 6. lib. ii. c. 10, II.

gro was again weak enough to fuffer himself to be amused with a prospect of terminating their differences by some amicable accommodation. By varying his overtures, and shifting his ground as often as it suited his purpose, sometimes seeming to yield every thing which his rival could defire, and then retracting all that he had granted, Pizarro dexteroufly protracted the negotiation to fuch a length, that though every day was precious to Almagro, several months elapsed without coming to any final agreement. While the attention of Almagro, and of the officers with whom he confulted, was occupied in detecting and eluding the fraudulent intentions of the governor, Gonzalo Pizarro and Alvarado found means to corrupt the foldiers to whose custody they were committed, and not only made their escape themselves, but persuaded fixty of the men who formerly guarded them to accompany their flight k. Fortune having thus delivered one of his brothers, the governor ferupled not at one act of perfidy more to procure the release of the other. He proposed, that every point in controversy between Almagro and himself should be submitted to the decision of their fovereign; that until his award was known, each should retain undisturbed possession of whatever part of the country he now occupied; that Ferdinand Pizarro should be set at liberty, and return instantly to Spain, together with the officers, whom Almagro purposed to send thither to represent the justice of his claims. Obvious as the defign of Pizarro was in those propositions, and familiar as his artifices might now have been

k Zarate, lib. iii. c. 8. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. ii. c. 14. VOL. II. G G to his opponent, Almagro, with a credulity approaching to infatuation, relied on his fincerity, and concluded an agreement on these terms.

The moment that Ferdinand Pizarro recovered his liberty, the governor, no longer fettered in his operations by anxiety about his brother's life, threw off every difguife which his concern for it had obliged him to assume. The treaty was forgotten; pacific and conciliating meafures were no more mentioned; it was in the field he openly declared, and not in the cabinet; by arms, and not by negotiation; that it must now be determined who should be master of Peru. The rapidity of his preparations suited such a decisive refolution. Seven hundred men were foon ready to march towards Cuzco. [1538] The command of these was given to his two brothers, in whom he could perfectly confide for the execution of his most violent schemes, as they were urged on, not only by the enmity flowing from the rivalship between their family and Almagro, but animated with the defire of vengeance, excited by recollection of their own recent difgrace and fufferings. After an unfuccessful attempt to cross the mountains in the direct road between Lima and Cuzco, they marched towards the fouth along the coast as far as Nasca, and then turning to the left, penetrated through the de-files in that branch of the Andes which lay between them and the capital. Almagro, instead of hearkening to some of his officers, who advised him to attempt the defence of those difficult passes, waited the approach of the enemy in the plain

¹ Herrera, dec. 6. lib. iii. c. 9. Zarate, lib. iii. c. 9. Gomara, Hist. c. 140. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 35.

chief

plain of Cuzco. Two reasons seem to have induced him to take this resolution. His followers amounted hardly to five hundred, and he was afraid of weakening fuch a feeble body by fending any detachment towards the mountains. His cavalry far exceeded that of the adverse party, both in number and discipline, and it was only in an open country that he could avail himself of that advantage. The Pizarros advanced without any obstruction, but what arose from the nature of the defert and horrid regions through which they marched. As foon as they reached the plain, both factions were equally impatient to bring this long-protracted contest to an iffue. Though countrymen and friends, the subjects of the same fovereign, and each with the royal standard difplayed; and though they beheld the mountains that furrounded the plain in which they were drawn up, covered with a vast multitude of Indians, assembled to enjoy the spectacle of their mutual carnage, and prepared to attack what-ever party remained master of the field; so fell and implacable was the rancour which had taken possession of every breast, that not one pacific counsel, not a fingle overture towards accommodation proceeded from either fide. Unfortunately for Almagro, he was fo worn out with the fatigues of service, to which his advanced age was unequal, that, at this crisis of his fate, he could not exert his wonted activity; and he was obliged to commit the leading of his troops to Orgognez, who, though an officer of great merit, did not possess the same ascendant either over the spirit or affections of the soldiers, as the chief whom they had long been accustomed to follow and revere.

G G 2

The conflict was fierce, and maintained by each party with equal courage [April 26]. On the fide of Almagro were more veteran soldiers, and a larger proportion of cavalry; but these were counterbalanced by Pizarro's superiority in numbers, and by two companies of well-disciplined musketeers, which, on receiving an account of the infurrection of the Indians, the emperor had fent from Spain m. As the use of fire-arms was not frequent among the adventurers in America n, hastily equipped for fervice, at their own expence, this small band of foldiers, regularly, trained and armed, was a novelty in Peru, and decided the fate of the day. Wherever it advanced, the weight of a heavy and well-fustained fire bore down horse and foot before it; and Orgognez, while he endeavoured to rally and animate his troops, having received a dangerous wound, the rout became general. The barbarity of the conquerors stained the glory which they acquired by this complete victory. The violence of civil rage hurried on some to slaughter their countrymen with indifcriminate cruelty; the meanness of private revenge instigated others to fingle out individuals as the objects of their vengeance. Orgognez and feveral officers of distinction were massacred in cold blood; above a hundred and forty foldiers fell in the field; a large proportion, where the number of com-batants were few, and the heat of the contest foon over. Almagro, though fo feeble that he could not bear the motion of a horse, had infifted on being carried in a litter to an eminence which overlooked the field of battle. From thence, in the utmost agitation of mind, he viewed the various movements of both parties, and at last beheld the total defeat of his own troops, with all the passionate indignation of a veteran leader long accustomed to victory. He endeavoured to save himself by slight, but was taken prisoner, and guarded with the strictest vigilance .

m Herrera, dec. 6. lib. iii. c. 8.

B Zarate, lib. iii. c. 8.

The Indians, instead of executing the resolution which they had formed, retired quietly after the battle was over; and in the history of the New World, there is not a more striking instance of the wonderful ascendant which the Spaniards had acquired over its inhabitants, than that after feeing one of the contending parties ruined and dispersed, and the other weakened and fatigued, they had not courage to fall upon their enemies, when fortune presented an opportunity of attacking them with fuch advantage P.

Cuzco was pillaged by the victorious troops, who found there a confiderable booty, confifting partly of the gleanings of the Indian treasures, and partly of the wealth amassed by their antagonists from the spoils of Peru and Chili. But fo far did this, and whatever the bounty of their leader could add to it, fall below the high ideas of the recompence which they conceived to be due to their merit, that Ferdinand Pizarro, unable to gratify fuch extravagant expectations, had recourse to the same expedient which his brother had employed on a similar occasion, and endeavoured to find occupation for this turbulent assuming spirit, in order to prevent it from breaking out into open mutiny. With this view, he encouraged his most active officers to attempt the discovery and reduction of various provinces which had not hitherto submitted to the Spaniards. To every standard erected by the leaders who undertook any of those new expeditions, volunteers resorted with the ardour and hope peculiar to the age. Several of Almagro's soldiers joined them, and thus Pizarro had the satisfaction of being delivered both from the importunity of his discontented friends, and the dread of his ancient enemies 9.

P Zarate, lib. iii. c. 11. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 38.

O Zarate, lib iii. c. 11, 12. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 36. 38. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. iii. c. 10-12. lib. iv. c. 1-6.

Almagro himself remained for several months in custody, under all the anguish of suspense. For although his doom was determined by the Pizarros from the moment that he sell into their hands, prudence constrained them to defer gratifying their vengeance, until the soldiers who had served under him, as well as several of their own followers in whom they could not perfectly conside, had lest Cuzco. As soon as they set out upon their different expeditions, Almagro was impeached of treason, formally tried, and condemned to die. The sentence assonished him; and though he had often braved death with undaunted spirit in the field, its approach under this ignominious form appalled him so much, that he had recourse to abject supplications, unworthy of his former fame. He besought the q Zarate, lib. iii. c. 12. Gomara, Hist. c. 141. Herrera, dec 6. lib. iv. c. 7.

Pizarros to remember the ancient friendship between their brother and him, and how much he had contributed to the prosperity of their family; he reminded them of the humanity with which, in opposition to the repeated remonstrances of his own most attached friends, he had spared their lives when he had them in his power; he conjured them to pity his age and infirmities, and to fuffer him to pass the wretched remainder of his days in bewailing his crimes, and in making his peace with Heaven. The entreaties, fays a Spanish historian, of a man so much beloved, touched many an unfeeling heart, and drew tears from many a stern eye. But the brothers remained inflexible. As foon as Almagro knew his fate to be inevitable, he met it with the dignity and fortitude of a veteran. He was strangled in prison, and afterwards publicly beheaded. He suffered in the seventy-fifth year of his age, and left one fon by an Indian woman of Panama, whom, though at that time a prisoner in Lima, he named as fucceffor to his government, pursuant to a power which the emperor had granted him r.

all intercourse with Spain was suspended, the detail of the extraordinary transactions there did not soon reach the court. Unfortunately for the victorious faction, the first intelligence was brought thither by some of Almagro's officers, who left the country upon the ruin of their cause; and they related what had happened, with every circumstance unfavourable to Pizarro and his brothers, Their ambition, their breach of the most folemn engagements, their violence and cruelty, were painted with all the malignity and exaggeration of party-hatred. Ferdinand Pizarro, who arrived foon after, and appeared in court with extraordinary splendour, endeavoured to efface the impression which their accusations had made, and to justify his brother and himself by representing Almagro as the aggressor. The emperor and his ministers, though they could not pronounce which of the contending factions was most criminal, clearly discerned the fatal tendency of their diffentions. It was obvious, that while the leaders, entrusted with the conduct of two infant colonies, employed the arms which should have been turned against the com-mon enemy in destroying one another, all at-tention to the public good must cease, and there was reason to dread that the Indians might improve the advantage which the difunion of the Spaniards presented to them, and extirpate both the victors and vanquished. But the evil was more apparent than the remedy. Where the information which had been received was fo defective and fuspicious, and the scene of action fo remote, it was almost impossible to chalk out the line of conduct that ought to be followed; and before any plan that should be approved of in Spain could be carried into execution, the fituation of the parties, and the circumstances of affairs, might alter so entirely as to render its effects extremely pernicious.

r Zarate, lib. iii. c. 12. Gomara, Hist. c. 141. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 39. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. iv. c. 9. lib. v. c. 1.

Nothing therefore remained but to fend a person to Peru, vested with extensive and discretionary tionary power, who, after viewing deliberately the posture of affairs with his own eyes, and enquiring upon the spot into the conduct of the different leaders, should be authorised to establish the government in that form which he deemed most conducive to the interest of the parent state, and the welfare of the colony. The man felected for this important charge was Christoval Vaca de Castro, a judge in the court of royal audience at Valladolid; and his abilities, integrity, and firmness, justified the choice. His instructions, though ample, were not such as to fetter him in his operations. According to the different aspect of affairs, he had power to take upon him different characters. If he found the governor still alive, he was to assume only the title of judge, to maintain the appearance of acting in concert with him, and to guard against giving any just cause of offence to a man who had merited so highly of his country. But if Pizarro were dead, he was entrusted with a commission that he might then produce, by which he was appointed his successor in the govern. ment of Peru. This attention to Pizarro, however, feems to have flowed rather from dread of his power, than from any approbation of his measures; for at the very time that the court feemed so folicitous not to irritate him, his brother Ferdinand was arrested at Madrid, and confined to a prison, where he remained above twenty years 3.

1540 While Vaca de Castro was preparing for his voyage, events of great moment happened

[•] Gomara, Hist. c. 142. Vega, p. 11. lib. ii. c. 40. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. viii. c. 10, 11. lib. x. c. 1.

Rapid

in Peru. The governor, confidering himfelf, upon the death of Almagro, as the unrivalled possessor of that vast empire, proceeded to parcel out its territories among the conquerors; and had this division been made with any degree of impartiality, the extent of country which he had to bestow, was sufficient to have gratisted his friends, and to have gained his enemies. But Pizarro conducted this transaction, not with the equity and candour of a judge attentive to dif-cover and to reward merit, but with the illiberal spirit of a party-leader. Large districts, in parts of the country most cultivated and populous, were fet apart as his own property, or granted to his brothers, his adherents, and favourites. To others, lots less valuable and inviting were affigned. The followers of Almagro, amongst whom were many of the original adventurers to whose valour and perseverance Pizarro was indebted for his fuccess, were totally excluded from any portion in those lands, towards the acquisition of which they had contributed fo largely. As the vanity of every individual fet an immoderate value upon his own fervices, and the idea of each concerning the recompence due to them role gradually to a more exorbitant height in proportion as their conquests extended, all who were disappointed in their expectations exclaimed loudly against the rapaciousness and partiality of the governor. The partisans of Almagro murmured in fecret, and meditated revenge t.

t Vega, p. 11. lib. iji. c. 2. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. viii.

Rapid as the progress of the Spaniards in South America had been since Pizarro landed in Peru, their avidity of dominion was not yet fatisfied. The officers to whom Ferdinand Pizarro gave the command of different detachments, penetrated into feveral new provinces; and though some of them were exposed to great hardships in the cold and barren regions of the Andes, and others fuffered diffress not inferior amidst the woods and marshes of the plains, they made discoveries and conquests which not only extended their knowledge of the country, but added confiderably to the territories of Spain in the New World. Pedro de Valdivia reassumed Almagro's scheme of invading Chili, and not-withstanding the fortitude of the natives in de-fending their possessions, made such progress in the conquest of the country, that he founded the city of St. Jago, and gave a beginning to the establishment of the Spanish dominion in that province u. But of all the enterprizes undertaken about this period, that of Gonzalo Pizarro was the most remarkable. The governor, who feems to have refolved that no person in Peru should possess any station of distinguished eminence or authority but those of his own family, had de-prived Benalcazar, the conqueror of Quito, of his command in that kingdom, and appointed his brother Gonzalo to take the government of it. He instructed him to attempt the discovery and conquest of the country to the east of the Andes, which, according to the information of the Indians, abounded with cinnamon and other valuable spices. Gonzalo, not inferior to any of his brothers in courage, and no less ambitious of acquiring distinction, eagerly engaged in this difficult service. He set out from Quito at the head of three hundred and forty foldiers, near one half of whom were horsemen, with four thousand Indians to carry their provisions. In forcing their way through the defiles, or over the ridges of the Andes, excess of cold and fa-tigue, to neither of which they were accustomed, proved fatal to the greater part of their wretched attendants. The Spaniards, though more robust, and inured to a variety of climates, suffered confiderably, and lost some men; but when they descended into the low country their distress increased. During two months it rained incesfantly, without any interval of fair weather long enough to dry their clothes *. The immense plains upon which they were now entering, either altogether without inhabitants, or occupied by the rudest and least industrious tribes in the New World, yielded little subsistence. They could not advance a step but as they cut a road through woods, or made it through marshes. Such incessant toil, and continual fcarcity of food, feem more than fufficient to have exhausted and dispirited any troops. But the fortitude and perseverance of the Spaniards in the fixteenth century were insuperable. Allured by frequent but false accounts of rich countries before them, they persisted in struggling on, until they reached the banks of the Coca or Napo, one of the large rivers whose waters pour into the Maragnon, and contribute to its gran-deur. There, with infinite labour, they built

Zarate, lib. iii, c. 13. Ovalle, lib. ii, c. 1, &c.

^{*} Zarate, lib. iv. c. 2.

tothard RA.del Bromley sculp. Published Feb 11. 1801, by Cadell & Davies, Strand.

a bark, which they expected would prove of great utility, in conveying them over rivers, in procuring provisions, and in exploring the country. This was manned with fifty foldiers, under the command of Francis Orellana, the officer next in rank to Pizarro. The stream carried them down with such rapidity, that they were soon far a-head of their countrymen, who followed slowly and with difficulty by land.

At this distance from his commander, Orellana, a young man of an aspiring mind, began to fancy himself independent, and transported with the predominant passion of the age, he formed the scheme of distinguishing himself as a discoverer, by following the course of the Maragnon, until it joined the ocean, and by surveying the vast regions through which it flows. This scheme of Orellana's was as bold as it was treacherous. For, if he be chargeable with the guilt of having violated his duty to his commander, and with having abandoned his fellow-foldiers in a pathless desert, where they had hardly any hopes of fuccess, or even of fafety, but what were founded on the fervice which they expected from the bark; his crime is, in fome measure, balanced by the glory of having ventured upon a navigation of near two thousand leagues, through unknown nations, in a vessel hastily constructed, with green timber, and by very unskilful hands, without provisions, without a compass, or a pilot. But his courage and alacrity supplied every defect. Committing himself fearlessly to the guidance of the stream, the Napo bore him along to the fouth, until he reached the great channel of the Maragnon. Turning with it towards the VOL. 11. HH coast, he held on his course in that direction. He made frequent descents on both sides of the river, sometimes seizing by force of arms the pro-visions of the sierce savages seated on its banks; and fometimes procuring a fupply of food by a friendly intercourse with more gentle tribes. After a long series of dangers, which he encountered with amazing fortitude, and of distreffes which he supported with no less magnanimity, he reached the ocean y, where new perils awaited him. These he likewise surmounted, and got fafe to the Spanish settlement in the island Cubagua; from thence he failed to Spain. The vanity natural to travellers who vifit regions unknown to the rest of mankind, and the art of an adventurer, folicitous to magnify his own merit, concurred in prompting him to mingle an ex-traordinary proportion of the marvellous in the narrative of his voyage. He pretended to have discovered nations so rich, that the roofs of their temples were covered with plates of gold; and. described a republic of women so warlike and powerful, as to have extended their dominion over a confiderable tract of the fertile plains which he had visited. Extravagant as those tales were, they gave rise to an opinion, that a region abounding with gold, distinguished by the name of El Dorado, and a community of Amazons, were to be found in this part of the New World; and fuch is the propenfity of mankind to believe what is wonderful, that it has been flowly and with difficulty that reason and observation have exploded those fables. The voyage, however, even when stripped of every romantic embellishment, deserves to be recorded, not only as one of the most memorable occurrences in that adventurous age, but as the first event which led to any certain knowledge of the extensive countries that stretch eastward from the Andes to the ocean z.

No words can describe the consternation of Pizarro, when he did not find the bark at the confluence of the Napo and Maragnon, where he had ordered Orellana to wait for him. He would not allow himself to suspect that a man, whom he had intrusted with such an important command, could be fo base and so unfeeling, as to defert him at fuch a juncture. But imputing his absence from the place of rendezvous to some unknown accident, he advanced above fifty leagues along the banks of the Maragnon, expecting every moment to fee the bark appear with a supply of provisions. [1541] At length he came up with an officer whom Orellana had left to perish in the desert, because he had the courage to remonstrate against his perfidy. From him he learned the extent of Orellana's crime, and his followers perceived at once their own desperate situation, when deprived of their only resource. The spirit of the stoutest hearted veteran funk within him, and all demanded to be led back instantly. Pizarro, though he assumed an appearance of tranquillity, did not oppose their inclination. But he was now twelve hundred miles from Quito; and in that long march the Spaniards encountered hardships greater than those which they had endured in their progress outward, without the alluring hopes which then soothed and animated them under their sufferings. Hunger compelled them to feed on roots and berries, to eat all their dogs and horses, to devour the most loathsome reptiles, and even to gnaw the leather of their saddles and swordbelts. Four thousand Indians, and two hundred and ten Spaniards, perished in this wild disastrous expedition, which continued near two years; and as sifty men were aboard the bark with Orellana, only sourscore got back to Quito. These were naked like savages, and so emaciated with famine, or worn out with satigue, that they had more the appearance of spectres than of men z.

than

z Zarate, lib. iv c. 4. Gomara, Hist c. 86. Vega, p. 11. lib. iii. c. 4. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. ix. c. 2—5. Rodriguez El Maragnon y Amazonas, lib. i. c. 3.

But, instead of returning to enjoy the repose which his condition required, Pizarro, on entering Quito, received accounts of a fatal event that threatened calamities more dreadful to him than those through which he had passed. From the time that his brother made that partial division of his conquests which has been mentioned, the adherents of Almagro, considering themselves as proscribed by the party in power, no longer entertained any hope of bettering their condition. Great numbers in despair resorted to Lima, where the house of young Almagro was always open to them, and the slender portion of his father's fortune which the governor allowed him to enjoy, was spent in affording them subsistence. The warm attachment with which every person who

² Zarate, lib. iv. c. 2-5. Vega, p. 11. lib. iii. c. 3, 4, 5. 14. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. viii. c. 7, 8. lib. ix. c. 2-5. dec. 7. lib. iii. c. 14. Pizar. Varones, Illustr. 349, &c.

who had ferved under the elder Almagro devoted himself to his interest, was quickly transferred to his fon, who was now grown up to the age of manhood, and possessed all the qualities which captivate the affections of foldiers. Of a graceful appearance, dexterous at all martial exercises, bold, open, generous, he seemed to be formed for command; and as his father, conscious of his own inferiority, from the total want of education, had been extremely attentive to have him instructed in every science becoming a gen-tleman; the accomplishments which he had acquired heightened the respect of his followers, as they gave him distinction and eminence among illiterate adventurers. In this young man the Almagrians found a point of union which they wanted, and looking up to him as their head, were ready to undertake any thing for his advancement. Nor was affection for Almagro their only incitement; they were urged on by their own distresses. Many of them, destitute of common necessaries a, and weary of loitering away life, a burden to their chief, or to such of their affociates as had faved fome remnant of their fortune from pillage and confiscation, longed impatiently for an occasion to exert their activity and courage, and began to deliberate how they might be avenged on the author of all their mifery. Their frequent cabals did not pass unobserved; and the governor was warned to be on his guard against men who meditated some desperate deed, and had resolution to execute it. But either from the native intrepidity of his mind, or from contempt of persons whose poverty seemed to render their

a See NOTE CXXXVIII.

machinations of little consequence, he difregarded the admonitions of his friends. "Be in no pain," faid he carelessly, "about my life; it is perfectly safe, as long as every man in Peru knows that I can in a moment cut off any head which dares to harbour a thought against it." This security gave the Almagrians full leisure to digest and ripen every part of their scheme; and Juan de Herrada, an officer of great abilities, who had the charge of Almagro's education, took the direction of their consultations, with all the zeal which this connection inspired, and with all the authority which the ascendant that he was known to have over the mind of his pupil gave him.

On Sunday, the twenty fixth of June, at mid-day, the feason of tranquillity and repose in all sultry climates, Herrada, at the head of eighteen of the most determined conspirators, sallied out of Almagro's house in complete armour; and drawing their fwords as they advanced hastily towards the governor's palace, cried out, "Long live the king, but let the tyrant die!" Their associates, warned of their motions by a signal, were in arms at different stations ready to support them. Though Pizarro was usually surrounded by such a numerous train of attendants as fuited the magnificence of the most opulent subject of the age in which he lived, yet as he was just rifen from table, and most of his domestics had retired to their own apartments, the conspirators passed through the two outer courts of the palace unobserved. They were at the bottom of the stair-case, before a page in waiting could give the alarm to his master, who was conversing with a few friends in a large hall. The governor, whose steady mind no form of danger could appal, starting up, called for arms, and commanded Francisco de Chaves to make fast the door. But that officer, who did not retain so much presence of mind as to obey this prudent order, running to the top of the stair-case, wildly asked the conspirators what they meant, and whither they were going? Instead of answering, they stabbed him to the heart, and burst into the hall. Some of the persons who were there threw themselves from the windows; others attempted to fly; and a few drawing their fwords, followed their leader into an inner apartment. The confpirators, animated with having the object of their vengeance now in view, rushed forward after Pizarro, with no other arms than his fword and buckler, defended the entry, and sup-ported by his half brother Alcantara, and his little knot of friends, he maintained the unequal contest with intrepidity worthy of his past exploits, and with the vigour of a youthful combatant, "Courage!" cried he, "companions, we are yet enow to make those traitors repent of their audacity!" But the armour of the conspirators protected them, while every thrust they made took effect. Alcantara fell dead at his brother's feet; his other defenders were mortally wounded. The governor, fo weary that he could hardly wield his fword, and no longer able to parry the many weapons furiously aimed at him, received a deadly thrust full in his throat, funk to the ground, and expired.

Pizarro

As foon as he was flain, the affaffins ran out into the streets, and waving their bloody swords, proclaimed the death of the tyrant. Above two hundred of their affociates having joined them, they conducted young Almagro in folemn procession through the city, and assembling the magistrates and principal citizens, compelled them to acknowledge him as lawful successor to his father in his government. The palace of Pizarro, together with the houses of several of his adherents, were pillaged by the foldiers, who had the fatisfaction at once of being avenged on their enemies, and of enriching themselves by the spoils of those through whose hands all the wealth of Peru had passed b.

The boldness and success of the conspiracy, as well as the name and popular qualities of Almagro, drew many foldiers to his standard. Every adventurer of desperate fortune, all who were distatished with Pizarro, and from the rapaciousness of his government in the latter years of his life, the number of malcontents was confiderable, declared without hefitation in favour of Almagro, and he was foon at the head of eight hundred of the most gallant veterans in Peru. As his youth and inexperience disqualified him from taking the command of them himself, he appointed Herrada to act as general. But though Almagro speedily collected such a respectable force, the acquiescence in his government was far from being general.

b Zarate, lib. iv. c. 6-8. Gomara Hist. c. 144, 145. Vega, p. 11. lib. iii. c. 5-7. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. x. c. 4-7. Pizarro Var. Illust. p. 183.

Pizarro had left many friends to whom his memory was dear; the barbarous affaffination of a man to whom his country was so highly indebted, filled every impartial person with horror. The ignominious birth of Almagro, as well as the doubtful title on which he founded his pretensions, led others to consider him as an usurper. The officers who commanded in some provinces refused to recognize his authority, until it was confirmed by the emperor. In others, particularly at Cuzco, the royal standard was erected, and preparations were begun in order to revenge the murder of their antient leader.

Those feeds of discord, which could not have lain long dormant, acquired great vigour and activity, when the arrival of Vaca de Castro was known. After a long and disastrous voyage, he was driven by stress of weather into a small harbour in the province of Popayan; and proceeding from thence by land, after a journey no less tedious than difficult, he reached Quito. In his way he received accounts of Pizarro's death, and of the events which followed upon it. He immediately produced the royal com-mission appointing him governor of Peru, with the same privileges and authority; and his jurisdiction was acknowledged without hesitation by Benalcazar, adelantado, or lieutenant-general, for the emperor in Popayan, and by Pedro de Puelles, who, in the absence of Gonzalo Pizarro, had the command of the troops left in Quito. Vaca de Castro not only assumed the supreme authority, but shewed that he possessed the talents which the exercise of it at that juncture required. By his influence and address he soon affembled affembled fuch a body of troops, as not only fet him above all fear of being exposed to any in-fult from the adverse party, but enabled him to advance from Quito with the dignity that be-came his character. By dispatching persons of confidence to the different settlements in Peru, with a formal notification of his arrival and of his commission, he communicated to his countrymen the royal pleasure with respect to the government of the country. By private emif-faries, he excited such officers as had discovered their disapprobation of Almagro's proceedings, to manifest their duty to their sovereign by supporting the person honoured with his commission. Those measures were productive of great effects. Encouraged by the approach of the new governor, or prepared by his machinations, the loyal were confirmed in their principles, and avowed them with greater boldness; the timid ventured to declare their sentiments; the neutral and wavering, finding it necessary to chuse a side, began to lean to that which now appeared to be the fafest, as well as the most just c.

Almagro observed the rapid progress of this spirit of disaffection to his cause, and in order to give an effectual check to it before the arrival of Vaca de Castro, he set out at the head of his troops for Cuzco [1542], where the most considerable body of opponents had erected the royal standard, under the command of Pedro Alvarez Holguin. During his march thither, Herrada, the skilful guide of his youth and of his counsels, died; and from that time his mea-

fures

c. 146, 147. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. x. c. 1, 2, 3. 7, &c.

fures were conspicuous for their violence, but concerted with little sagacity, and executed with no address. Holguin, who, with forces far inferior to those of the opposite party, was descending towards the coast at the very time that Almagro was on his way to Cuzco, deceived his unexperienced adversary by a very simple stratagem, avoided an engagement, and effected a junction with Alvarado, an officer of note, who had been the first to declare again Almagro as an usurper.

Soon after, Vaca de Castro entered their camp with the troops which he brought from Quito, and erecting the royal flandard before his own tent, he declared, that, as governor, he would discharge in person all the functions of general of their combined forces. Though formed by the tenour of his past life to the habits of a sedentary and pacific profession, he at once assumed the activity and discovered the decision of an officer long accustomed to command. Knowing his strength to be now far superior to that of the enemy, he was impatient to terminate the contest by a battle. Nor did the followers of Almagro, who had no hopes of obtaining a pardon for a crime fo atrocious as the murder of the governor, decline that mode of decision. They met at Chupaz [Sept. 16], about two hundred miles from Cuzco, and fought with all the fierce animofity inspired by the violence of civil rage, the rancour of private enmity, the eagerness of revenge, and the last efforts of despair. Victory, after remaining long doubtful, declared at last for Vaca de Castro. The superior number of his troops, his own intrepidity, and the martial talents of Francisco de Carvajal, a veteran officer formed under the great captain in the wars of Italy, and who on that day laid the foundation of his future fame in Peru, triumphed over the bravery of his opponents, though led on by young Almagro with a gallant spirit, worthy of a better cause, and deserving another fate. The carnage was great in proportion to the number of the combatants. Many of the vanquished, especially such as were conscious that they might be charged with being accessory to the assalination of Pizarro, rushing on the swords of the enemy, chose to fall like soldiers, rather than wait an ignominious doom. Of sourteen hundred men, the total amount of combatants on both sides, sive hundred lay dead on the field, and the number of the wounded was still greater d.

If the military talents displayed by Vaca de Castro, both in the council and in the field, surprised the adventurers in Peru, they were still more astonished at his conduct after the victory. As he was by nature a rigid dispenser of justice, and persuaded that it required examples of extraordinary severity to restrain the licentious spirit of soldiers so far removed from the seat of government, he proceeded directly to try his prisoners as rebels. Forty were condemned to suffer the death of traitors, others were banished from Peru. Their leader, who made his escape from the battle, being betrayed by some of his officers, was publicly beheaded in Cuzco; and d Zarate, lib. iv. c. 12—19. Gomara, c. 148. Vega, p. 11. lib. iii. c. 11—18. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. i. c. 1, 2, 3. lib. iii. c. 1—11.

in him the name of Almagro, and the spirit of the party, was extinct .

During those violent convulsions in Peru, the emperor and his ministers were intently employed in preparing regulations, by which they hoped not only to re-establish tranquillity there, but to introduce a more perfect system of internal policy into all their settlements in the New World. It is manifest from all the events recorded in the history of America, that rapid and extensive as the Spanish conquests there had been, they were not carried on by any regular exertion of the national force, but by the occasional efforts of private adventurers. After fitting out a few of the first armaments for discovering new regions, the court of Spain, during the bufy reigns of Ferdinand and of Charles V., the former the most intriguing prince of the age, and the latter the most ambitious, was encumbered with such a multiplicity of schemes, and involved in war with fo many nations of Europe, that it had not leifure to attend to diftant and less interesting objects. The care of profecuting discovery, or of attempting conquest, was abandoned to individuals; and with fuch ardour did men push forward in this new career, on which novelty, the spirit of adventure, avarice, ambition, and the hope of meriting heaven, prompted them with combined influence to enter, that in less than half a century almost the whole of that extensive empire which Spain now possesses in the New World, was subjected to its dominion. As the Spanish court contributed nothing towards, the various expeditions's undertaken in America, it was not entitled to claim much from their success. The sovereignty of the conquered provinces, with the fifth of the gold and filver, was referved for the crown; every thing else was seized by the associates in each expedition as their own right. The plunder of the countries which they invaded served to indemnify them for what they had expended in a equipping themselves for the service, and the conquered territory was divided among them, according to rules which custom had introduced, as permanent establishments which their successful valour merited. In the infancy of those settlements, when their extent as well as their value were unknown, many irregularities escaped obfervation, and it was found necessary to connive at many excesses. The conquered people were frequently pillaged with destructive rapacity, and their country parcelled out among its new masters in exorbitant shares, far exceeding the highest recompence due to their services. The rude conquerors of America, incapable of forming their establishments upon any general or extensive plan of policy, attentive only to private interest, un-willing to forego present gain from the prospect of remote or public benefit, seem to have had no object but to amass sudden wealth, without regarding what might be the consequences of the means by which they acquired it. But when time at length discovered to the Spanish court the importance of its American possessions, the necessity of new-modelling their whole frame be-came obvious, and in place of the maxims and practices prevalent among military adventurers, it was found requisite to substitute the institutions of regular government.

vol. 11. buted

e Zarate, lib. iv. c. 21. Gomara, c. 150. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. iii. c, 12. lib. vi. c. 1.

One evil in particular called for an immediate remedy. The conquerors of Mexico and Peru imitated the fatal example of their countrymen fettled in the islands, and employed themselves in searching for gold and silver with the same inconsiderate eagerness. Similar effects followed. The natives, employed in this labour by masters who, in imposing tasks, had no regard either to what they felt or to what they were able to perform, pined away and perished so fast, that there was reason to apprehend that Spain, instead of possessing countries peopled to such a degree as to be susceptible of progressive improvement, would soon remain proprietor only of a vast uninhabited desert.

The emperor and his ministers were so sensible of this, and fo folicitous to prevent the extinction of the Indian race, which threatened to render their acquisitions of no value, that from time to time various laws, which I have mentioned, had been made for fecuring to that unhappy people more gentle and equitable treatment. But the distance of America from the feat of empire, the feebleness of government in the new colonies, the avarice and audacity of foldiers unaccustomed to restraint, prevented these salutary regulations from operating with any confiderable influence. The evil continued to grow, and at this time the emperor found an interval of leifure from the affairs of Europe to take it into attentive consideration. He confulted not only with his ministers and the members of the council of the Indies, but called upon feveral persons who had resided long in the New World, to aid them with the result of their experience and observation. Fortunately for the people of America, among these was Bartholomew de las Casas, who happened to be then at Madrid on a mission from a chapter of his order at Chiapa f. Though, since the miscarriage of his former schemes for the relief of the Indians, he had continued shut up in his cloister, or occupied in religious functions, his zeal in behalf of the former objects of his pity was fo far from abating, that, from an increased knowledge of their sufferings, its ardour had augmented. He seized eagerly this opportunity of reviving his favourite maxims concerning the treatment of the Indians. With the moving eloquence natural to a man on whose mind the fcenes which he had beheld had made a deep impression, he described the irreparable waste of the human species in the New World, the Indian race almost totally swept away in the Islands in less than fifty years, and hastening to extinction on the continent with the same rapid decay. With the decisive tone of one strongly preposfessed with the truth of his own system, he imputed all this to a single cause, to the exactions and cruelty of his countrymen, and contended that nothing could prevent the depopulation of America, but the declaring of its natives to be freemen, and treating them as subjects, not as freemen, and treating them as subjects, not as slaves. Nor did he confide for the success of this proposal in the powers of his oratory alone. In order to enforce them, he composed his famous treatise concerning the destruction of f Remefal, Hist, de Chiapa, p. 146.

America,

America^g, in which he relates, with many horrid circumstances, but with apparent marks of exaggerated description, the devastation of every province which had been visited by the Spaniards.

The emperor was deeply afflicted with the recital of fo many actions shocking to humanity. But as his views extended far beyond those of Las Cafas, he perceived that relieving the Indians from oppression was but one step towards rendering his possessions in the New World a valuable acquisition, and would be of little avail, unless he could circumscribe the power and usurpations of his own fubjects there. The conquerors of America, however great their merit had been towards their country, were mostly perfons of fuch mean birth, and of fuch an abject rank in fociety, as gave no distinction in the eye of a monarch. The exorbitant wealth with which fome of them returned, gave umbrage to an age not accustomed to see men in inferior condition elevated above their level, and rifing to emulate or to furpass the antient nobility in fplendour. The territories which their leaders had appropriated to themselves were of such enormous extent h, that if the country should ever be improved in proportion to the fertility of the foil, they must grow too wealthy and too powerful for subjects. It appeared to Charles that this abuse required a remedy no less than the other, and that the regulations concerning both must be enforced by a mode of government more vigorous than had yet been introduced into America.

⁸ Remesal, p. 192, 199. h See Note CXXXIX.

113 With

With this view he framed a body of laws, containing many falutary appointments with respect to the constitution and powers of the supreme council of the Indies; concerning the station and jurisdiction of the royal audiences in different parts of America; the administration of justice; the order of government, both ecclesiastical and civil. These were approved of by all ranks of men. But together with them were issued the following regulations, which excited universal alarm, and occasioned the most violent convulfions: "That as the repartimientos or shares of land feized by feveral persons appeared to be excessive, the royal audiences are empowered to reduce them to a moderate extent: That upon the death of any conqueror or planter, the lands and Indians granted to him shall not descend to his widow or children, but return to the crown: That the Indians shall henceforth be exempt from personal service, and shall not be compelled to carry the baggage of travellers, to labour in the mines, or to dive in the pearl fisheries: That the flated tribute due by them to their superior shall be ascertained, and they shall be paid as fervants for any work they voluntarily perform: That all perfons who are or have been in public offices, all ecclesiaftics of every denomination, all hospitals and monasteries, shall be deprived of the lands and Indians allotted to them, and these be annexed to the crown: That every person in Peru, who had any criminal concern in the contests between Pizarro and Almagro, should forfeit his lands and Indians i,".

i Herrera, dec. 7. lib. vi. c. 5. Fernandez, Hist. lib. î. c. 1, 2.

All the Spanish ministers who had hitherto. been entrusted with the direction of American affairs, and who were best acquainted with the state of the country, remonstrated against those regulations as ruinous to their infant colonies. They represented, that the number of Spaniards who had hitherto emigrated to the New World was fo extremely fmall, that nothing could be expected from any effort of theirs towards improving the vast regions over which they were scattered; that the success of every scheme for this purpose must depend upon the ministry and service of the Indians, whose native indolence and aversion to labour, no prospect of benefit or promise of reward could furmount; that the moment the right of imposing a talk, and exacting the performance of it, was taken from their masters, every work of industry must cease, and all the fources from which wealth begun to pour in upon Spain must be stopt for ever. But Charles, tenacious at all times of his own opinions, and so much impressed at present with the view of the disorders which reigned in America, that he was willing to hazard the application even of a dangerous remedy, persisted in his resolution of publishing the laws. That they might be carried into execution with greater vigour and authority, he authorifed Francisco Tello de Sandoval to repair to Mexico as Vifitador or fu-perintendant of that country, and to co-operate with Antonio de Mendoza, the viceroy, in enforcing them. He appointed Blasco Nugnez Vela to be governor of Peru, with the title of Viceroy; and in order to strengthen his administration, he established a court of royal audience in Lima [1543], in which four lawyers of eminence were to prefide as judges k.

The viceroy and superintendant sailed at the fame time; and an account of the laws which they were to enforce reached America before them. The entry of Sandoval into Mexico was viewed as the prelude of general ruin. The unlimited grant of liberty to the Indians affected every Spaniard in America without distinction, and there was hardly one who might not on some pretext be included under the other regulations, and fuffer by them. But the colony in New Spain had now been fo long accustomed to the restraints of law and authority under the steady and prudent administration of Mendoza, that how much soever the spirit of the new statutes was detested and dreaded, no attempt was made to obstruct the publication of them by any act of violence unbecoming subjects. The magistrates and principal inhabitants, however, presented dutiful addresses to the viceroy and superintendent, representing the fatal consequences of en-forcing them. Happily for them, Mendoza, by long residence in the country, was so thoroughly acquainted with its flate, that he knew what was for its interest as well as what it could bear; and Sandoval, though new in office, difplayed a degree of moderation feldom possessed by persons just entering upon the exercise of power. They engaged to suspend, for some time, the execution of what was offensive in the new laws, and not only consented that a deputation of the second consented the tation of citizens should be sent to Europe to lay before the emperor the apprehensions of his subjects in New Spain with respect to their tendency and effects, but they concurred with them in supporting their sentiments. Charles, moved by the opinion of men whose abilities and integrity entitled them to decide concerning what fell immediately under their own view, granted such a relaxation of the rigour of the laws as re-established the colony in its former tranquillity 1.

k Zarate, lib. iii. c. 24. Gomara, c. 151. p. 2. lib. iii, c. 20.

In Peru the storm gathered with an aspect still more fierce and threatening, and was not fo soon dispelled. The conquerors of Peru, of a rank much inferior to those who had subjected Mexico to the Spanish crown, farther removed from the inspection of the parent-state, and intoxicated with the sudden acquisition of wealth, carried on all their operations with greater licence and irregularity than any body of adventurers in the New World. Amidst the general fubversion of law and order, occasioned by two fuccessive civil wars, when each individual was at liberty to decide for himself, without any guide but his own interest or passions, this turbulent spirit rose above all sense of subordination. To men thus corrupted by anarchy, the introduction of regular government, the power of a viceroy, and the authority of a respectable court of judicature, would of themselves have appeared formidable restraints, to which they would have submitted with reluctance. But they revolted

¹ Fernandez, Hist. lib. i. c. 3, 4, 5 Vega, p. 11. lib. iii. c. 21, 22. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. v. c. 7. lib. vii. c. 14, 15. Torquem. Mond. Ind. lib. v. c. 13.

revolted with indignation against the idea of complying with laws by which they were to be stripped at once of all they had earned so hardly during many years of service and suffering. As the account of the new laws spread successively through the different fettlements, the inhabitants ran together, the women in tears, and the men exclaiming against the injustice and ingratitude of their sovereign in depriving them, unheard and unconvicted, of their possessions. "Is this," cried they, "the recompence due to perfons, who, without public aid, at their own expence, and by their own valour, have subjected to the crown of Castile territories of such immense extent and opulence? Are these the rewards be-showed for having endured unparalleled distress, for having encountered every species of danger in the service of their country? Whose merit is so great, whose conduct has been so irreproachable, that he may not be condemned by some penal clause in regulations, conceived in terms as loose and comprehensive, as if it had been intended that all should be entangled in their snare? Every Spaniard of note in Peru has held fome public office, and all, without distinction, have been constrained to take an active part in the contest between the two rival chiefs. Were the former to be robbed of their property because they had done their duty? Were the latter to be punished on account of what they could not avoid? Shall the conquerors of this great empire, instead of receiving marks of distinction, be deprived of the natural consolation of providing for their widows and children, and leave them to depend depend for subsistence on the scanty supply they can extort from unfeeling courtiers ^m? We are not able now, continued they, to explore unknown regions in quest of more secure settlements; our constitutions debilitated with age, and our bodies covered with wounds, are no longer fit for active service; but still we possess vigour sufficient to affert our just rights, and we will not tamely suffer them to be wrested from us ⁿ."

By discourses of this fort, uttered with vehemence, and liftened to with univerfal approbation, their passions were inflamed to such a pitch, that they were prepared for the most violent measures; and began to hold consultations in different places, how they might oppose the en-trance of the viceroy and judges, and prevent not only the execution but the promulgation of the new laws. From this, however, they were diverted by the address of Vaca de Castro, who flattered them with hopes, that, as foon as the viceroy and judges should arrive, and had leisure to examine their petitions and remonstrances, they would concur with them in endeavouring to procure some mitigation in the rigour of laws which had been framed without due attention either to the state of the country, or to the sentiments of the people. A greater degree of accommodation to these, and even some concessions on the part of government, were now become requisite to compose the present ferment, and to foothe the colonists into submission, by infpiring them with confidence in their superiors.

m Herrera, dec. 7. lib. vii. c. 14, 15.

ⁿ Gomara, c. 152. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. vi. c. 10, 11. Vega, p. 11. lib. iii. c. 20. 22, lib. iv. c. 3, 4.

But without profound discernment, conciliating manners, and flexibility of temper, such a plan could not be carried on. The viceroy possessed none of these. Of all the qualities that sit men for high command, he was endowed only with integrity and courage; the former, harsh and uncomplying, the latter bordering so frequently on rashness or obstinacy, that in his situation they were defects rather than virtues. From the moment that he landed at Tumbez [March 4], Nugnez Vela feems to have confidered himfelf merely as an executive officer, without any difcretionary power; and, regardless of whatever he observed or heard concerning the state of the country, he adhered to the letter of the regulations with unrelenting rigour. In all the towns through which he passed, the natives were declared to be free, every person in public office was deprived of his lands and servants; and as an example of obedience to others, he would not suffer a single Indian to be employed in carrying his own baggage in his march towards Lima. Amazement and conflernation went before him as he approached; and so little solicitous was he to prevent these from augmenting, that, on entering the capital, he openly avowed that he came to obey the orders of his sovereign, not to dispense with his laws. This harsh declaration was accompanied with what rendered it still more intolerable, haughtiness in deportment, a tone of arrogance and decision in discourse, and an infolence of office grievous to men little accustomed to hold civil authority in high respect. Every attempt to procure a suspension or mitigation of the new laws, the viceroy considered as slowing from from a spirit of disaffection that tended to rebellion. Several persons of rank were confined, and some put to death, without any form of trial. Vaca de Castro was arrested, and notwithstanding the dignity of his former rank, and his merit, in having prevented a general insurrection in the colony, he was loaded with chains, and shut up in the common jail o.

But however general the indignation was against such proceedings, it is probable the hand of authority would have been strong enough to suppress it, or to prevent it bursting out with open violence, if the malcontents had not been provided with a leader of credit and eminence to unite and to direct their efforts. From the time that the purport of the new regulations was known in Peru, every Spaniard there turned his eyes towards Gonzalo Pizarro, as the only person able to avert the ruin with which they threatened the colony. From all quarters, letters and addreffes were fent to him, conjuring him to ftand forth as their common protector, and offering to support him in the attempt with their lives and fortunes. Gonzalo, though inferior in talents to his other brothers, was equally ambitious, and of courage no less daring. The behaviour of an ungrateful court towards his brothers and himself, dwelt continually on his mind. Ferdinand a state prisoner in Europe, the children of the governor in custody of the viceroy, and fent aboard his fleet, himself reduced to the condition

vol. ii. KK of

^o Zarate, lib. iv. c. 23, 24, 25. Gomara, c. 153-155. Vega, p. 11. lib. iv. c. 4, 5. Fernandez, lib. i. c. 6-10.

of a private citizen in a country, for the discovery and conquest of which Spain was indebted to his family. These thoughts prompted him to feek for vengeance, and to affert the rights of his family, of which he now confidered himself as the guardian and the heir. But as no Spaniard can easily surmount that veneration for his sovereign which seems to be interwoven in his frame, the idea of marching in arms against the royal standard filled him with horror. He hesitated long, and was still unrefolved, when the violence of the viceroy, the universal call of his countrymen, and the certainty of becoming foon a vic-tim himself to the severity of the new laws, moved him to quit his residence at Chuquisaca de la Plata, and repair to Cuzco. All the inhabitants went out to meet him, and received him with transports of joy as the deliverer of the colony. In the fervour of their zeal, they elected him procurator-general of the Spanish nation in Peru, to folicit the repeal of the late regulations. They empowered him to lay their remonstrances before the royal audience in Lima, and upon pretext of danger from the Indians, authorifed him to march thither in arms. [1544.] Under fanction of this nomination Pizarro took poffession of the royal treasure, appointed officers, levied foldiers, feized a large train of artillery which Vaca de Castro had deposited in Gumanga, and fet out for Lima, as if he had been advancing against a public enemy. Disaffection having now assumed a regular form, and being united under a chief of such distinguished name, many persons of note resorted to his standard; and a confiderable part of the troops, raifed by the viceroy to oppuse his progress, deserted to him in a body P.

Before Pizarro reached Lima, a revolution had happened there; which encouraged him to proceed with almost certainty of success. The violence of the viceroy's administration was not more formidable to the Spaniards of Peru, than his overbearing haughtiness was odious to his affociates, the judges of the royal audience. During their voyage from Spain, some symptoms of coldness between the viceroy and them began to appear q. But as foon as they entered upon the exercise of their respective offices, both parties were so much exasperated by frequent contests, arising from interference of jurisdiction, and contrariety of opinion, that their mutual difgust soon grew into open enmity. The judges thwarted the viceroy in every measure, set at liberty prifoners whom he had confined, justified the mal-contents, and applauded their remonstrances. At a time when both departments of govern-ment should have united against the approaching enemy, they were contending with each other for superiority. The judges at length prevailed. The viceroy, univerfally odious, and abandoned even by his own guards, was feized in his palace [Sept. 18], and carried to a defert island on the coast, to be kept there until he could be sent home to Spain.

9 Gomara, c. 171.

P Zarate, lib. v. c. 1. Gomara, c. 156, 157. Vega, p. 11. lib. iv. c. 4—12. Fernandez, lib. i. c. 12—17. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. vii. c. 18, &c. lib. viii. c. 1—5.

The judges, in consequence of this, having assumed the supreme direction of affairs into their own hands, issued a proclamation suspending the execution of the obnoxious laws, and fent a message to Pizarro, requiring him, as they had already granted whatever he could request, to dismiss his troops, and to repair to Lima with fifteen or twenty attendants. They could hardly expect that a man so daring and ambitious would tamely comply with this requisition. It was made, probably, with no such intention, but only to throw a decent veil over their own conduct; for Cepeda, the president of the court of audience, a pragmatical and aspiring lawyer, seems to have held a secret correspondence with Pizarro, and had already formed the plan, which he afterwards executed, of devoting himself to his service. The imprisonment of the viceroy, the usurpation of the judges, together with the universal confusion and anarchy consequent upon events so singular and unexpected, opened new and vast prospects to Pizarro. He now beheld the supreme power within his reach. Nor did he want courage to push on towards the object which fortune presented to his view. Carvajal, the prompter of his resolutions, and guide of all his actions, had long fixed his eye upon it as the only end at which Pizarro ought to aim. Instead of the inferior function of procurator for the Spanish settlements in Peru, he openly demanded to be governor and captain-general of the whole province, and required the court of audience to grant him a commission to that effect. At the head of twelve hundred men, within a mile of Lima,

Lima, where there was neither leader nor army to oppose him, such a request carried with it the authority of a command. But the judges, either from unwillingness to relinquish power, or from a desire of preserving some attention to appearances, hesitated, or seemed to hesitate, about complying with what he demanded. Carvajal, impatient of delay, and impetuous in all his operations, marched into the city by night, seized several officers of distinction obnoxious to Pizarro, and hanged them without the formality of a trial. Next morning the court of audience issued a commission in the emperor's name, appointing Pizarro governor of Peru, with full powers, civil as well as military, and he entered the town that day with extraordinary pomp, to take possession of his new dignity.

Oct. 28.] But amidst the disorder and turbulence which accompanied this total dissolution of the frame of government, the minds of men, set loose from the ordinary restraints of law and authority, acted with such capricious irregularity, that events no less extraordinary than unexpected followed in a rapid succession. Pizarro had scarcely begun to exercise the new powers with which he was invested, when he beheld formidable enemies rise up to oppose him. The viceroy having been put on board a vessel by the judges of the audience, in order that he might be carried to Spain under custody of Juan Alvarez, one of their own number; as soon as they were out at sea, Alvarez, either touched with remorse or moved by fear, kneeled down to his prisoner, declaring him from that moment to be free, and that he himself, and every person in the ship, would obey him as the legal representative of their sovereign. Nugnez Vela ordered the pilot of the vessel to shape his course towards Tumbez, and as soon as he landed there, erected the royal standard, and refumed his functions of viceroy. Several persons of note, to whom the contagion of the feditious fpirit which reigned at Cuzco and Lima had not reached, instantly avowed their resolution to support his authority . The violence of Pizarro's government, who observed every individual with the jealoufy natural to usurpers, and who punished every appearance of disaffection with unforgiving severity, soon augmented the number of the viceroy's adherents, as it forced some leading men in the colony to fly to him for refuge. While he was gathering fuch strength at Tumbez, that his forces began to assume the appearance of what was confidered as an army in America, Diego Centeno, a bold and active officer, exasperated by the cruelty and oppression of Pizarro's lieutenant-governor in the province of Charcas, formed a conspiracy against his life, cut him off, and declared for the viceroy t.

r Zarate, lib. v. c. 8—10. Vega, p. 11. lib. iv. c. 13—19. Gomara, c. 159—163. Fernandez, lib. i. c. 18—25. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. viii. c. 10—20.

1545.] Pizarro, though alarmed with those appearances of holdility in the opposite extremes of the empire, was not disconcerted. He prepared to affert the authority to which he had attained, with the spirit and conduct of an officer accustomed to command, and marched directly against the viceroy as the enemy who was nearest as well as most formidable. As he was master of the public revenues in Peru, and most of the military men were attached to his family, his troops were fo numerous, that the viceroy, unable to face them, retreated towards Quito. Pizarro followed him; and in that long march, through a wild mountainous country, fuffered hardships and encountered difficulties, which no troops but those accustomed to serve in America could have endured or furmounted". The viceroy had fcarcely reached Quito, when the van-guard of Pizarro's forces appeared, led by Carvajal, who, though near fourfcore, was as hardy and active as any young foldier under his command. Nugnez Vela instantly abandoned a town incapable of defence, and with a rapidity more resembling a slight than a retreat, marched into the province of Popayan. Pizarro continued to pursue; but finding it impossible to overtake him, returned to Quito. From thence he dispatched Carvajal to oppose Centeno, who was growing formidable in the fouthern provinces of the empire, and he himfelf remained there to make head against the

^t Zarate, lib. v. c. 18. Gomara, c. 169. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. ix. c. 27.

^e Zarate, lib. v. c. 9. Gomara, c. 165. Fernandez, lib. i. c. 23. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. viii. c. 15.

By his own activity, and the affistance of Benalcazar, Nugnez Vela soon assembled four hundred men in Popayan. As he retained, amidst all his disasters, the same elevation of mind, and the same high sense of his own dignity, he rejected with disdain the advice of some of his followers, who urged him to make overtures of accommodation to Pizarro, declaring that it was only by the fword that a contest with rebels could be decided. With this intention he marched back to Quito [1546]. Pizarro, relying on the superior number, and still more on the discipline and valour of his troops, advanced resolutely to meet him [January 18]. The battle was fierce and bloody, both parties fighting like men who knew that the possession of a great empire, the fate of their leaders, and their own future fortune, depended upon the iffue of that day. But Pizarro's veterans pushed forward with fuch regular and well-directed force, that they foon began to make impression on their enemies. The viceroy, by extraordinary exertions, in which the abilities of a commander and the courage of a foldier were equally displayed, held victory for some time in suspense. At length he fell, pierced with many wounds; and the rout of his followers became general. They were hotly purfued. His head was cut off, and placed on the public gibbet in Quito, which Pizarro entered in triumph. The troops affembled by Centeno were dispersed soon after by Carvajal, and he himself compelled to fly to the mountains, where he remained for feveral months concealed in a cave. Every person in Peru, from the frontiers of Popayan to those of Chili, submitted to Pizarro; and by his fleet, under Pedro de Hinojosa, he had not only the unrivalled command of the South-Sea, but had taken possession of Panama, and placed a garrison in Nombre de Dios, on the opposite side of the isthmus, which rendered By Bri rendered him mafter of the only avenue of communication between Spain and Peru, that was used at that period y. A day with the same

[&]quot; See Note CXL.

^{*} Zarate, lib. v. c. 15, 16-24. Gomara, c. 167. Vega, p. 11. lib. iv. c. 25-28. Fernandez, lib. i. c. 34. 40. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. viii. c. 16. 20-27.

. After this decifive victory, Pizarro and his followers remained for some time at Quito, and during the first transports of their exultation, they ran into every excess of licentious indulgence, with the riotous spirit usual among low adventurers upon extraordinary fuccefs. But amidst this diffipation, their chief and his confidents were obliged to turn their thoughts fometimes to what was ferious, and deliberated with much folicitude concerning the part that he ought now to take. Carvajal, no less bold and decifive in counsel than in the field, had from the beginning warned Pizarro, that in the career on which he was entering, it was vain to think of holding a middle course; that he must either boldly aim at all, or attempt nothing. From the time that Pizarro obtained possession of the government of Peru, he inculcated the same maxim with greater earnestness. Upon receiving an account of the victory at Quito, he remonstrated with him in a tone still more peremptory. "You have usurped (faid he, in a letter written to Pizarro on that occasion) the supreme power in this country, in contempt of the emperor's commission to the viceroy. You have marched, in hostile array, against the royal standard; you have attacked the representative of your fovereign in the field, have defeated him, and cut off his head. Think not that ever a monarch will forgive fuch infults on his dignity, or that any reconciliation with him can be cordial or fincere. Depend no longer on the precarious favour of another. Assume yourself the sove-reignty over a country, to the dominion of which your family has a title founded on the rights both of discovery and conquest. It is in your power to attach every Spaniard in Peru of any confequence inviolably to your interest by liberal grants of lands and of Indians, or by instituting. ranks of nobility, and creating titles of honour fimilar to those which are courted with so much eagerness in Europe. By establishing orders of knighthood, with privileges and distinctions refembling those in Spain, you may bestow a gra-tiscation upon the officers in your service, suited to the ideas of military men. Nor is it to your countrymen only that you ought to attend; endeavour to gain the natives. By marrying the Coya, or daughter of the Sun next in succession to the crown, you will induce the Indians, out of veneration for the blood of their antient princes, to unite with the Spaniards in Support of your authority. Thus, at the head of the antient inhabitants of Peru, as well as of the new fettlers there, you may fet at defiance the power of Spain, and repel with ease any feeble force which it can fend at such a distance." Cepeda, the lawyer, who was now Pizarro's confidential counfellor, warmly feconded Carvajal's exhortations, and employed whatever learning he poffessed in demonstrating, that all the founders of great monarchies had been raised to pre-eminence, not by the antiquity of their lineage, or the validity

Zarate, lib. v. c. 31, 32. Gomara, c. 170. Vega, p. 11. lib. iv. c. 33, 34. Fernandez, lib. i. c. 51-54. Herrera, dec. 7. lib. x. c. 12. 19-22. dec. 8. lib. i. c. 1-3. Benzo, lib. iii. c. 12.

lidity of their rights, but by their own afpiring

valour and personal merit 2.

Pizarro listened attentively to both, and could not conceal the fatisfaction with which he contemplated the object that they presented to his view. But happily for the tranquillity of the world, few men possess that superior strength of mind, and extent of abilities, which are capable of forming and executing fuch daring schemes, as cannot be accomplished without overturning the established order of fociety, and violating those maxims of duty which men are accustomed to hold facred. The mediocrity of Pizarro's talents circumfcribed his ambition within more narrow limits. Instead of aspiring at independent power, he confined his views to the obtaining from the court of Spain-a confirmation of the authority which he now possessed; and for that purpose he sent an officer of distinction thither, to give fuch a representation of his conduct, and of the state of the country, as might induce the emperor and his ministers, either from inclination or from necessity, to continue him in his present flation.

While Pizarro was deliberating with respect to the part which he should take, consultations were held in Spain, with no less solicitude, concerning the measures which ought to be pursued in order to re-establish the emperor's authority in Peru. Though unacquainted with the last excesses of outrage to which the malcontents had proceeded in that country, the court had received an account of the insurrection against the viceroy, of his imprisonment, and the usurpation of the government by Pizarro. A revolution fo alarming called for an immediate interpolition of the emperor's abilities and authority. But as he was fully occupied at that time in Germany, in conducting the war against the famous league of Smalkalde, one of the most interesting and arduous enterprises in his reign, the care of providing a remedy for the disorders in Peru devolved upon his fon Philip, and the counfellors whom Charles had appointed to affift him in the government of Spain during his absence. At first view, the actions of Pizarro and his adherents appeared so repugnant to the duty of subjects towards their fovereign, that the greater part of the ministers infifted on declaring them instantly to be guilty of rebellion, and on proceeding to punish them with exemplary rigour. But when the fervour of their zeal and indignation began to abate, innumerable obstacles to the execution of this measure presented themselves. The veteran bands of infantry, the strength and glory of the Spanish armies, were then employed in Germany. Spain, exhaufted of men and money by a long feries of wars, in which she had been involved by the reftless ambition of two successive monarchs, could not eafily equip an armament of sufficient force to reduce Pizarro. To transport any respectable body of troops to a country so remote as Peru, appeared almost impossible. While Pizarro continued master of the South-Sea, the direct route by Nombre de Dios and Panama was impracticable. An attempt to march to Quito by land through the new kingdom of Granada, and the province of Popayan, across regions of prodigious prodigious extent, defolate, unhealthy, or inhabited by fierce and hostile tribes, would be attended with unfurmountable danger and hardships. The passage to the South-Sea by the Straits of Magellan was fo tedious, fo uncertain, and so little known in that age, that no confidence could be placed in any effort carried on in a course of navigation so remote and precarious. Nothing then remained but to relinquish the fystem which the ardour of their loyalty had first fuggested, and to attempt by lenient measures what could not be effected by force. It was manifest, from Pizarro's solicitude to represent his conduct in a favourable light to the emperor, that, notwithstanding the excesses of which he had been guilty, he still retained sentiments of veneration for his fovereign. By a proper application to these, together with some such concessions as should discover a spirit of moderation and forbearance in government, there was still room to hope that he might be yet reclaimed, or the ideas of loyalty natural to Spaniards might fo far revive among his followers, that they would no longer lend their aid to uphold his usurped authority.

² Vega, p. 11. lib. iv. c. 40. Fernandez, lib. i. c. 34. lib. ii. c. 1. 49. Herrera, dec. 8. lib. ii. c. 10.

VOL. II.

by

The fucces, however, of this negotiation, no less delicate than it was important, depended entirely on the abilities and address of the person to whom it should be committed. After weighing with much attention the comparative merit of various persons, the Spanish ministers fixed with unanimity of choice upon Pedro de la Gasca, a priest in no higher station than that of counsellor to the Inquisition. Though in no public office, he had been occasionally employed by government in affairs of trust and consequence. and had conducted them with no less skill than fuccess; displaying a gentle and infinuating temper, accompanied with much firmness; probity, superior to any feeling of private interest; and a cautious circumspection in concerting meafures, followed by fuch vigour in executing them, as is rarely found in alliance with the other. These qualities marked him out for the function to which he was destined. The emperor, to whom Gasca was not unknown, warmly approved of the choice, and communicated it to him in a letter containing expressions of goodwill and confidence, no less honourable to the prince who wrote, than to the fubject who received it. Gasca, notwithstanding his advanced age and feeble constitution, and though, from the apprehensions natural to a man, who, during the course of his life, had never been out of his own country, he dreaded the effects of a long voyage, and of an unhealthy climate a, did not hesitate a moment about complying with the will of his fovereign. But as a proof that it was from this principle alone he acted, he refused a bishopric which was offered to him, in order that he might appear in Peru with a more dignified character; he would accept of no higher title than that of president of the court of audience in Lima; and declared that he would receive no falary on account of his discharging the duties of that office. All he required was, that the expence of supporting his family should be defrayed by the public, and as he was to go like a minister of peace with his gown and breviary,

LL

- 4

Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 17.

and without any retinue but a few domestics, this would not load the revenue with any enormous burden b.

But while he discovered such disinterested moderation with respect to whatever related personally to himself, he demanded his official powers in a very different tone. He infifted, as he was to be employed in a country for remote from the feat of government, where he could not have recourse to his sovereign for new instructions on every emergence; and as the whole fuccess of his negotiations must depend upon the confidence which the people with whom he had to treat could place in the extent of his powers, that he ought to be invested with unlimited authority; that his jurisdiction must reach to all persons and to all causes; that he must be empowered to pardon, to punish, or to reward, as circumstances and the behaviour of different men might require: that in case of resistance from the malcontents, he might be authorifed to reduce them to obedience by force of arms, to levy troops for that purpole, and to call for affiftance from the governors of all the Spanish settlements in America. These powers, though manifestly conducive to the great objects of his mission, appeared to the Spanish ministers to be inalienable prerogatives of royalty, which ought not to be delegated to a subject, and they refused to grant them. But the emperor's views were more enlarged. As, from the nature of his employment, Gasca must be entrusted with discretionary power in several points, and all his efforts might prove ineffectual if he was circumfcribed in any one particular, Charles scrupled not to invest him with authority to the full extent that he demanded. Highly satisfied with this fresh proof of his master's confidence, Gasca hastened his departure, and, without either money or troops, set out to quell a formidable rebellion.

b Zarate, lib. vi. c. 6. Gomara, c. 174. Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 14-16. Vega, p. 11. lib. v. c. 1. Herrera, dec. 8. lib. i. c. 4, &c.

On his arrival at Nombre de Dios [July 27], he found Herman Mexia, an officer of note, posted there, by order of Pizarro, with a confiderable body of men to oppose the landing of any hostile forces. But Gasca appeared in such pacific guise, with a train so little formidable, and with a title of no such dignity as to excite terror, that he was received with much respect. From Nombre de Dios he advanced to Panama, and met with a similar reception from Hinojofa, whom Pizarro had entrusted with the government of that town, and the command of his fleet flationed there. In both places he held the same language, declaring that he was fent by their fovereign as a messenger of peace, not as a minister of vengeance; that he came to redress all their grievances, to revoke the laws which had excited alarm, to pardon palt offences, and to re-establish order and justice in the government of Peru. His mild deportment, the simplicity of his manners, the fanctity of his profession, and a winning appearance of candour, gained credit to his declarations. The veneration due to a person clothed with legal authority, and acting in virtue of a royal commission, began to revive among men accustomed for some time to nothing more respectable

Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 16-18.

respectable than an usurped jurisdiction. Hinojosa, Mexia, and several other officers of distinction, to each of whom Gasca applied separately, were gained over to his interest, and waited only for some decent occasion of declaring openly in his favour d.

This the violence of Pizarro foon afforded them. As foon as he heard of Gasca's arrival at Panama, though he received, at the same time, an account of the nature of his commission, and was informed of his offers not only to render every Spaniard in Peru eafy concerning what was past, by an act of general oblivion; but secure with respect to the future, by repealing the obnoxious laws; instead of accepting with gratitude his fovereign's gracious concessions, he was fo much exasperated on finding that he was not to be continued in his station as governor of the country, that he instantly resolved to oppose the president's entry into Peru, and to prevent his exercifing any jurisdiction there. To this desperate resolution he added another highly preposterous. He sent a new deputation to Spain to justify this conduct, and to insist, in name of all the communities in Peru, for a confirmation of the government to himself during life, as the only means of preferving tranquillity . there. The persons entrusted with this strange commission, intimated the intention of Pizarro to the prefident, and required him, in his name, to depart from Panama and return to Spain. They carried likewise secret instructions to Hinojosa, directing him to offer Gasca a present of d Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 21, &c. Zarate, lib. vi. c. 6, 7. Gomara, c. 175. Vega, p 11. lib. v. c. 3. fifty LL3 Ballager fifty thousand pesos, if he would comply voluntarily with what was demanded of him; and if he should continue obstinate, to cut him off either by affaffination or poison c.

Many circumstances concurred in pushing on Pizarro to those wild measures. Having been once accustomed to supreme command, he could not bear the thoughts of descending to a private station. Conscious of his own demerit, he sufpected that the emperor studied only to deceive him, and would never pardon the outrages which he had committed. His chief confidents, no less guilty, entertained the same apprehensions. The approach of Gasca without any military force excited no terror. There were now above fix thousand Spaniards settled in Peruf; and at the head of these he doubted not to maintain his own independence, if the court of Spain should refuse to grant what he required. But he knew not that a spirit of defection had already begun to spread among those whom he' trusted most. Hinojosa, amazed at Pizarro's precipitate resolution of setting himself in opposition to the emperor's commission, and disdaining to be his instrument in perpetrating the odious crimes pointed out in his fecret instructions, publicly recognized the title of the prefident to the supreme authority in Peru. officers under his command did the same. Such was the contagious influence of the example, that it reached even the deputies who had been fent from Peru; and at the time when Pizarro

f Herrera, dec. 8. lib. ili, c. 1,

e Zarate, lib. vi. c. 8. Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 33, 34. Herrera, dec. 8. lib. ii. c. 9, 10.

expected to hear either of Gasca's return to Spain, or of his death, he received an account of his being mafter of the fleet, of Panama, and of the troops stationed there.

1547.7 Irritated almost to madness by events so unexpected, he openly prepared for war; and in order to give some colour of justice to his arms, appointed the court of audience in Lima to proceed to the trial of Gasca, for the crimes of having feized his ships, seduced his officers, and prevented his deputies from proceeding in their voyage to Spain. Cepeda, though acting as a judge in virtue of the royal commission, did not scruple to prostitute the dignity of his function by finding Gasca guilty of treason, and condemning him to death on that account 8. Wild. and even ridiculous as this proceeding was, it imposed on the low illiterate adventurers, with whom Peru was filled, by the femblance of a legal fanction warranting Pizarro to carry on hostilities against a convicted traitor. Soldiers accordingly reforted from every quarter to his flandard, and he was foon at the head of a thoufand men, the best equipped that had ever taken the field in Peru.

Gasca, on his part, perceiving that force must be employed in order to accomplish the purpose of his mission, was no less assiduous in collecting troops from Nicaragua, Carthagena, and other fettlements on the continent; and with fuch fuccess, that he was foon in a condition to detach a fquadron of his fleet, with a confiderable body of foldiers, to the coast of Peru [April]. Their appearance excited a dreadful alarm; and though they did not attempt for some time to make any descent, they did more effectual service, by setting ashore in different places persons who dispersed copies of the act of general indemnity, and the revocation of the late edicts; and who made known everywhere the pacific intentions, as well as mild temper, of the president. The effect of spreading this information was wonderful. All who were diffatisfied with Pizarro's violent administration, all who retained any sentiments of fidelity to their fovereign, began to meditate revolt. Some openly deferted a cause which they now deemed to be unjust. Centeno, leaving the cave in which he lay concealed, affembled about fifty of his former adherents, and with this feeble half-armed band advanced boldly to Cuzco. By a fudden attack in the night-time, in which he displayed no less military skill than valour, he rendered himself master of that capital, though defended by a garrison of five hundred men. Most of these having ranged themselves under his banners, he had soon the command of a respectable body of troops h.

E Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 55. Vega, p. 11. lib. v. c. 7. Herrera, dec. 8. lib. iii. c. 6.

Pizarro, though aftonished at beholding one enemy approaching by sea, and another by land, at a time when he trusted to the union of all Peru in his favour, was of a spirit more undaunted, and more accustomed to the vicissitudes of fortune, than to be disconcerted or appalled. As the danger from Centeno's operations was the most urgent, he instantly set out to oppose him. Having provided horses for all his soldiers, he

h Zarate, lib. vi. c. 13-16. Gomara, c. 180, 181. Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 28. 64, &c.

marched with amazing rapidity. But every morning he found his force diminished, by numbers who had left him during the night; and though he became suspicious to excess, and punished without mercy all whom he suspected, the rage of defertion was too violent to be checked. Before he got within fight of the enemy at Huarina, near the lake Titiaca, he could not muster more than four hundred foldiers. But these he justly confidered as men of tried attachment, on whom he might depend. They were indeed the boldest and most desperate of his followers, conscious, like himself, of crimes for which they could hardly expect forgiveness, and without any hope but in the success of their arms. With these he did not hesitate to attack Centeno's troops [October 20], though double to his own in number. The royalists did not decline the combat. It was the most obstinate and bloody that had hitherto been fought in Peru. At length the intrepid valour of Pizarro, and the fuperiority of Carvajal's military talents, triumphed over numbers, and obtained a complete victory. The booty was immense, and the treatment of the vanquished cruel. By this fignal success the reputation of Pizarro was re-established, and being now deemed invincible in the field, his army increased daily in num-

But events happened in other parts of Peru, which more than counterbalanced the splendid victory at Huarina. Pizarro had scarcely left

i See Note CXLI.

k Zarate, lib. vii. c. 2, 3.

Gomara, c. 181. Vega, p. 11. lib. v. c. 18, &c. Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 79. Herrera, dec. 8. lib. iv. c. 1, 2.

Lima.

Lima, when the citizens, weary of his oppressive dominion, erected the royal standard, and Aldana, with a detachment of foldiers from the fleet, took possession of the town. About the same time 1, Gasca landed at Tumbez with five hundred men. Encouraged by his presence, every settlement in the low country declared for the king. The fituation of the two parties was now perfectly reversed; Cuzco and the adjacent provinces were possessed by Pizarro; all the rest of the empire, from Quito fouthward, acknowledged the jurisdiction of the president. As his numbers augmented fast, Gasca advanced into the interior part of the country. His behaviour still continued to be gentle and unassuming; he expressed on every occasion, his ardent wish of terminating the contest without bloodshed. More folicitous to reclaim than to punish, he upbraided no man for past offences, but received them as a father receives penitent children returning to a sense of their duty. Though desirous of peace, he did not slacken his preparations for war. He appointed the general rendezvous of his troops in the fertile valley of Xauxa, on the road to Cuzco m. There he remained for some months, not only that he might have time to make another attempt towards an accommodation with Pizarro, but that he might train his new foldiers to the use of arms, and accustom them to the discipline of a camp, before he led them against a body of victorious veterans. Pizarro, intoxicated with the fuccess which had hitherto accompanied his arms, and elated with having again near a thousand men under his command, refused to listen to any terms, although Cepeda, together with several of his officers, and even Carvajal himself n, gave it as their advice to close with the president's offer of a general indemnity, and the revocation of the obnoxious laws o. Gasca having tried in vain every expedient to avoid imbruing his hands in the blood of his countrymen, began to move towards Cuzco [Dec. 29], at the head of sixteen hundred men.

¹ Zarate, lib. vi. c. 17.

Tarate, lib. vii. c. 9. Fernandez, lib. ii, c. 77. 82.

Pizarro, confident of victory, fuffered the royalists to pass all the rivers which lie between Guamanga and Cuzco without opposition [1548], and to advance within four leagues of that capital, flattering himself that a defeat in such a situation as rendered escape impracticable would at once terminate the war. He then marched out to meet the enemy [April 9], and Carvajal chose his ground, and made the disposition of the troops with the discerning eye, and profound knowledge in the art of war conspicuous in all his operations. As the two armies moved forwards flowly to the charge, the appearance of each was fingular. In that of Pizarro, composed of men enriched with the spoils of the most opulent country in America, every officer, and almost all the private men, were clothed in stuffs of filk, or brocade, embroidered with gold and filver; and their horses, their arms, their standards, were adorned with all the pride of military pomp P. That of Gasca, though not so splendid, exhibited what was no less striking. He himself, n See Note CXLII. Vega, p. 11. lib. v. c. 27.

O Zarate, lib. vii. c. 6.
P Zarate, lib. vi. c. 11.
accompanied accompanied by the archbishop of Lima, the bishops of Quito and Cuzco, and a great number of ecclesiastics, marching along the lines, blessing the men, and encouraging them to a resolute discharge of their duty.

When both armies were just ready to engage. Cepeda fet spurs to his horse, galloped off, and furrendered himself to the president. Garcilasso de la Vega, and other officers of note, followed his example. The revolt of persons in fuch high rank struck all with amazement. The mutual confidence on which the union and strength of armies depend, ceased at once. Diftrust and consternation spread from rank to rank. Some filently slipped away, others threw down their arms, the greatest number went over to the royalists. Pizarro, Carvajal, and some leaders, employed authority, threats, and entreaties. to stop them, but in vain. In less than half an hour, a body of men, which might have decided the fate of the Peruvian empire, was totally difpersed. Pizarro, seeing all irretrievably lost, cried out in amazement to a few officers who still faithfully adhered to him, "What remains for us to do ?"-" Let us rush," replied one of them, " upon the enemy's firmest battalion, and die like Romans." Dejected with fuch a reverse of fortune, he had not spirit to follow this foldierly counsel, and with a tameness disgraceful to his former fame, he furrendered to one of Gasca's officers. Carvajal, endeavouring to escape, was overtaken and seized.

Gasca, happy in this bloodless victory, did not stain it with cruelty. Pizarro, Carvajal, and a small number of the most distinguished or notorious

GASCA Blejsing and encouraging his ARMY.

E.Stothard R.S.del. Tublished Feb. a 1801, by Cadell & Davies, Strand.

rious offenders, were punished capitally. Pizarro was beheaded on the day after he furrendered. He submitted to his fate with a composed dignity, and feemed defirous to atone by repentance for the crimes which he had committed. The end of Carvajal was suitable to his life. On his trial he offered no defence. When the sentence adjudging him to be hanged was pronounced, he carelessly replied, "One can die but once." During the interval between the sentence and execution, he discovered no sign either of remorfe for the past, or of solicitude about the future; scoffing at all who visited him, in his usual farcastic vein of mirth, with the same quickness of repartee and gross pleasantry as at any other period of his life. Cepeda, more criminal than either, ought to have shared the same fate; but the merit of having deferted his affociates at fuch a critical moment, and with fuch decifive effect, faved him from immediate punishment. He was fent, however, as a prisoner to Spain, and died in confinement q.

In the minute detail which the contemporary historians have given of the civil dissensions that raged in Peru, with little interruption, during ten years, many circumstances occur so striking, and which indicate such an uncommon state of manners, as to merit particular attention.

Though the Spaniards who first invaded Peru were of the lowest order in society, and the greater part of those who afterwards joined them were persons of desperate fortune, yet in all the bodies of troops brought into the field by the different leaders who contended for superiority, not one man acted as a hired soldier, that follows his standard for pay. Every adventurer in Peru considered himself as a conqueror, entitled, by his fervices, to an establishment in that country which had been acquired by his valour. In the contests between the rival chiefs, each chose his side as he was directed by his own judgment or affections. He joined his com-mander as a companion of his fortune, and difdained to degrade himself by receiving the wages of a mercenary. It was to their fword, not to pre-eminence in office, or nobility of birth, that most of the leaders whom they followed were indebted for their elevation; and each of their adherents hoped, by the same means, to open a way for himself to the possession of power and wealth r.

VOL. II. M M bodies

^q Zarate, lib. vii. c. 6, 7, 8. Gomara, c. 185, 186. Vega, p. 11. lib. v. c. 30, &c. Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 86, &c. Herrera, dec. 8. lib. iv. c. 14, &c.

But though the troops in Peru ferved without any regular pay, they were raifed at immense expence. Among men accustomed to divide the spoils of an opulent country, the desire of obtaining wealth acquired incredible force. The ardour of pursuit augmented in proportion to the hope of success. Where all were intent on the same object, and under the dominion of the same passion, there was but one mode of gaining men, or of securing their attachment. Officers of name and influence, besides the promise of success that the promise of future establishments, received in hand large gratuities from the chief with whom they engaged. Gonzalo Pizarro, in order to raise a thousand men, advanced five hundred thousand pelos s. Gasca expended in levying the troops which he led against Pizarro nine hundred thousand pesost, The distribution of property, bestowed as the reward of services, was still more exorbitant. Cepeda, as the recompence of his perfidy and address, in persuading the court of royal audience to give the fanction of its authority to the usurped jurisdiction of Pizarro, received a grant of lands which yielded an annual income of a hundred and fifty thousand pesos u. Hinojosa, who, by his early defection from Pizarro, and furrender of the fleet to Gasca, decided the fate of Peru, obtained a district of country affording two hundred thousand pesos of yearly value x. While fuch rewards were dealt out to the principal officers, with more than royal munificence, proportional shares were conferred upon those of inferior rank. I want to have a so the state of the

F Vega, p. 11. lib. iv. c. 38. 41.

Such a rapid change of fortune produced its natural effects. It gave birth to new wants, and new defires. Veterans, long accustomed to hardship and toil, acquired of a sudden a taste for profuse and inconfiderate dislipation, and indulged in all the excesses of military licentiousness. The riot of low debauchery occupied some; a relish for expensive luxuries spread among others y. The meanest soldier in Peru would have thought himfelf degraded by marching on foot; and at a time when the prices of horses in that country were exorbitant, each in-

Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 54.

^t Zarate, lib. vii. c. 10. Herrera, dec. 8. lib. v. c. 7.
^u Gomara, c. 164. * Vega, p. 11. lib. vi. c. 3.

y Herrera, dec. 5. lib. ii. c. 3. dec. 8. lib. viii. c. 10.

fifted M M 2

fisted on being furnished with one before he would take the field. But though less patient under the fatigue and hardships of service, they were ready to face danger and death with as much intrepidity as ever; and animated by the hope of new rewards, they never failed, on the day of battle, to display all their antient valour.

Together with their courage, they retained all the ferocity by which they were originally diffinguished. Civil discord never raged with a more fell spirit than among the Spaniards in Peru. To all the passions which usually envenom contests among countrymen, avarice was added, and rendered their enmity more rancorous. Eagerness to seize the valuable forseitures expected upon the death of every opponent, shut the door against mercy. To be wealthy, was of itself sufficient to expose a man to accusation, or to subject him to punishment. On the slightest fuspicions, Pizarro condemned many of the most opulent inhabitants in Peru to death. Carvajal, without fearching for any pretext to justify his cruelty, cut off many more. The number of those who suffered by the hand of the executioner, was not much inferior to what fell in the field z; and the greater part was condemned without the formality of any legal trial.

The violence with which the contending parties treated their opponents was not accompanied with its usual attendants, attachment and fidelity to those with whom they acted. The ties of honour which ought to be held facred among foldiers, and the principle of integrity, interwoven as thoroughly in the Spanish character as in that of any nation, feem to have been equally forgotten. Even regard for decency, and the fense of shame, were totally lost. During their diffensions, there was hardly a Spaniard in Peru who did not abandon the party which he had originally espoused, betray the associates with whom he had united, and violate the engagements under which he had come. The viceroy Nugnez Vela was ruined by the treachery of Cepeda and the other judges of the royal au-dience, who were bound by the duties of their function to have supported his authority. The chief advisers and companions of Gonzalo Pizarro's revolt were the first to forfake him, and submit to his enemies. His fleet was given up to Gasca, by the man whom he had fingled out among his officers to entrust with that important command. On the day that was to decide his fate, an army of veterans, in fight of the enemy, threw down their arms without firiking a blow, and deserted a leader who had often conducted them to victory. Instances of such general and avowed contempt of the principles and obligations which attach man to man, and bind them together in focial union, rarely occur in history. It is only where men are far removed from the feat of government, where the restraints of law and order are little felt, where the prospect of gain is unbounded, and where immense wealth may cover the crimes by which it is acquired, that we can find any parallel to the levity, the rapaciousness, the perfidy, and corruption prevalent among the Spaniards in Peru.

On the death of Pizarro, the malcontents in every corner of Peru laid down their arms, and tranquillity seemed to be perfectly re-established. But two very interesting objects still remained to occupy the president's attention. The one was to find immediately fuch employment for a multitude of turbulent and daring adven-turers with which the country was filled, as might prevent them from exciting new commotions. The other to bestow proper gratifications upon those to whose loyalty and valour he had been indebted for his success. The former of these was in some measure accomplished, by appointing Pedro de Valdivia to profecute the conquest of Chili; and by empowering Diego Centeno to undertake the discovery of the vast regions bordering on the river De la Plata. The reputation of those leaders, together with the hopes of acquiring wealth, and of rising to consequence in some unexplored country, alluring many of the most indigent and desperate soldiers to follow their standards, drained off no inconsiderable portion of that mutinous spirit which Gasca dreaded.

The latter was an affair of greater difficulty, and to be adjusted with a more attentive and delicate hand. The repartimientos, or allotments of lands and Indians which fell to be distributed, in consequence of the death or forfeiture of the former possession, exceeded two millions of pesos of yearly rent. Gasca, when now absolute master of this immense property, retained the same disinterested sentiments which he had originally professed, and refused to reserve the smallest portion of it for himself. But the number of claimants was great; and whilft the vanity or avarice of every individual fixed the value of his own fervices, and estimated the recompence which he thought due to him, the pretensions of each were so extravagant, that it was impossible to satisfy all. Gasca listened to them one by one, with the most patient attention; and that he might have leifure to weigh the comparative merit of their feveral claims with accuracy, he retired, with the archbishop of Lima and a fingle fecretary, to a village twelve leagues from Cuzco. There he spent several days in allotting to each a district of lands and number of Indians, in proportion to his idea of their past services and future importance. But that he might get beyond the reach of the fierce ftorm of clamour and rage, which he foresaw would burst out on the publication of his decree, notwithstanding the impartial equity with which he had framed it, he fet out for Lima, leaving the instrument of partition sealed up, with orders not to open it for some days after his departure.

The indignation excited by publishing the decree of partition [Aug. 24] was not less than Gasca had expected. Vanity, avarice, emulation, envy, shame, rage, and all the other passions which most vehemently agitate the minds of men when both their honour and their interest are deeply affected, conspired in adding to its violence. It broke out with all the fury of military insolence. Calumny, threats, and curses, were poured out openly upon the president. He was accused of ingratitude, of partiality, and of injustice. Among soldiers prompt to action, such seditious discourse would have been soon followed by deeds no less violent, and they already began to turn their eyes towards some discontented leaders, expecting them to stand forth in redress of their wrongs. By some vigorous interpositions of government, a timely check was given to this mutinous spirit, and the danger of another civil war was averted for the present b.

ingratitude,

1549.] Gasca, however, perceiving that the flame was suppressed rather than extinguished, laboured with the utmost affiduity to soothe the malcontents, by bestowing large gratuities on fome, by promising repartimientos, when they fell vacant, to others, and by caressing and flattering all. But that the public fecurity might rest on a foundation more stable than their good affection, he endeavoured to strengthen the hands of his successors in office, by re-establishing the regular administration of justice in every part of the empire. He introduced order and simplicity into the mode of collecting the royal revenue. He issued regulations concerning the treatment of the Indians, well calculated to protect them from oppression, and to provide for their instruction in the principles of religion, without de-priving the Spaniards of the benefit accruing from their labour. Having now accomplished every object of his mission [1550], Gasca, longing to return again to a private station, committed the government of Peru to the court of audience, and fet out for Spain [Feb. 1]. As, during the anarchy and turbulence of the four last years, there had been no remittance made of the royal revenue, he carried with him thirteen hundred thousand pesos of public money, which the economy and order of his administration enabled him to save, after paying all the expences of the war.

b Zarate, lib. vii. c. 9. Gomara, c. 187. Vega, p. 111 lib. vii. c. 1, &c. Fernandez, p. 11. lib. i. c. 1, &c. Herrera, dec. 8. lib. iv. c. 17, &c.

He was received in his native country with universal admiration of his abilities, and of his virtue. Both were, indeed, highly conspicuous. Without army, or fleet, or public funds; with a train fo simple, that only three thousand ducats were expended in equipping him c, he fet out to oppose a formidable rebellion. By his address and talents he supplied all those defects, and feemed to create instruments for executing his defigns. He acquired fuch a naval force, as gave him the command of the sea. He raised a body of men able to cope with the veteran bands which gave law to Peru. He vanquished their leader, on whose arms victory had hitherto attended, and in place of anarchy and usurpation, he established the government of laws, and the authority of the rightful fovereign. But the praise bestowed on his abilities was exceeded by that which his virtue merited. After residing in a country where wealth prefented allurements which had feduced every person who had hi-therto possessed power there, he returned from that trying station with integrity not only untainted but unsuspected. After distributing among his countrymen possessions of greater extent and value than had ever been in the disposal of a subject in any age or nation, he himself remained in his original state of poverty; and at the very time when he brought such a large recruit to the royal treasury, he was obliged to apply by petition for a small sum to discharge some petty debts which he had contracted during the course of his service. Charles was not insensible to such disinterested merit. Gasca was received by him with the most distinguishing marks of esteem, and being promoted to the bishopric of Palencia, he passed the remainder of his days in the tranquillity of retirement, respected by his country, honoured by his sovereign, and beloved by all.

Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 18.

Notwithstanding all Gasca's wise regulations, the tranquillity of Peru was not of long continuance. In a country, where the authority of government had been almost forgotten during the long prevalence of anarchy and misrule, where there were disappointed leaders ripe for revolt, and seditious soldiers ready to follow them, it was not difficult to raise combustion. Several successive insurrections desolated the country for some years. But as those, though sierce, were only transient storms, excited rather by the ambition and turbulence of particular men, than by general or public motives, the detail of them is not the object of this history. These commotions in Peru, like every thing of extreme violence either in the natural or political body, were not of long duration, and by carrying off the corrupted humours which had given rife to the diforders, they contributed in the end to strengthen the society which at first they threatened to destroy. During their sierce con-tests, several of the first invaders of Peru, and many of those licentious adventurers whom the fame of their fuccess had allured thither, fell by each other's hands. Each of the parties, as they alternately prevailed in the struggle, gradually cleared the country of a number of tur-bulent spirits, by executing, proscribing, or banishing their opponents. Men less enterprising, less desperate, and more accustomed to move in the path of sober and peaceable industry, settled in Peru; and the royal authority was gradually established as sirmly there as in the other Spanish colonies.

age of the correspond beam with the following and a fiber of them. Only comed and a fiber of the ros real and plant to an income to trace of their second had also a risting to hard on a new of the best obliged white some bules, book, by capalledy enderline, ar at foreignous countries of the the state of and the law and to be seen and a seen dates, ben'ed in Pern, and the roys within to gradi alasti in application of rations on grant appeals from the track of the

STICK, THE

NOTES

AND

ILLUSTRATIONS.

NOTE LIV. p. 3.

HE number of the fish in the rivers of South America is fo extraordinary, as to merit particular notice. "In the Maragnon (fays P. Acugna) fish are so plentiful, that, without any art, they may take them with the hands." p. 138. "In the Orinoco, (fays P. Gumilla,) besides an infinite variety of other fish, tortoise or turtle abound in such numbers, that I cannot find words to express it. I doubt not but that such as read my account will accuse me of exaggeration; but I can affirm, that it is as difficult to count them as to count the fands on the banks of that river. One may judge of their number by the amazing confumption of them; for all the nations contiguous to the river, and even many who are at a distance, flock thither at the season of breeding, and not only find fustenance during that time, but carry off great numbers both of the turtles and of their eggs, &c." Hist. de l'Orenoque, ii. c. 22. p. 59. M. de la Condamine confirms their accounts, p. 159.

NOTE LV. p. 3.

Prso describes two of these plants, the Curaquape, and the Guajana-Timbo. It is remarkable, that though they have this satal effect upon fishes, they are so far from being noxious to the human species, that they are used VOL. II.

in medicine with success. Piso, lib. iv. c. 88. Bancrost mentions another, the Hiarree, a small quantity of which is sufficient to inebriate all the fish to a considerable distance, so that in a few minutes they float motionless on the surface of the water, and are taken with ease. Nat. Hist. of Guiana, p. 106.

NOTE LVI. p. 6.

REMARKABLE instances occur of the calamities which rude nations fuffer by famine. Alvar Nugnez Cabeca de Vaca, one of the most gallant and virtuous of the Spanish adventurers, resided almost nine years among the favages of Florida. They were unacquainted with every species of agriculture. Their subfistence was poor and precarious. "They live chiefly (fays he) upon roots of different plants, which they procure with great difficulty, wandering from place to place in fearch of them. Sometimes they kill game, fometimes they catch fish, but in such small quantities, that their hunger is so extreme as compels them to eat spiders, the eggs of ants. worms, lizards, ferpents, a kind of uncluous earth, and I am perfuaded, that if in this country there were any stones, they would swallow these. They preferve the bones of fishes and serpents, which they grind into powder, and eat. The only feafon when they do not fuffer much from famine, is when a certain fruit, which he calls Tunas, is ripe. This is the fame with the Opuntia, or prickly pear, of a reddish and yellow colour, with a fweet and infipid tafte. They are sometimes obliged to travel far from their usual place of residence, in order to find them." Nausragias, c. xviii. p. 20, 21, 22. In another place, he observes that they are frequently reduced to pass two or three days without food, c. xxiv. p. 27.

NOTE LVII. p. 7.

M. FERMIN has given an accurate description of the two species of manioc, with an account of its culture, to which he has added some experiments, in order to ascertain the possonous qualities of the juice extracted from that species which he calls the bitter cassava. Among the Spaniards it is known by the name of Yuca brawa. Descr. de Surin, tom. i. p. 66.

NOTE LVIII. p. 8.

THE plantain is found in Afia and Africa, as well as in America. Oviedo contends, that it is not an indigenous plant of the New World, but was introduced into the island of Hispaniola, in the year 1516, by father Thomas de Berlanga, and that he transplanted it from the Canary Islands, whither the original slips had been brought from the East Indies. Oviedo, lib. viii. c. 1. But the opinion of Acosta and other naturalists, who reckon it an American plant, seems to be better sounded. Acost. Hist. Nat. lib. iv. 21. It was cultivated by rude tribes in America, who had little intercourse with the Spaniards, and who were destitute of that ingenuity, which disposes men to borrow what is useful from foreign nations. Gumil. iii. 186. Wafer's Voyage, p. 87.

NOTE LIX. p. 9.

IT is remarkable, that Acosta, one of the most accurate and best informed writers concerning the West Indies, affirms, that maize, though cultivated in the continent, was not known in the islands, the inhabitants of which had none but cassad bread. Hist. Nat. lib. iv. c. 16. But P. Martyr, in the first book of his first Decad, which was writen in the year 1493, upon the return of Columbus from his first voyage, expressly mentions maize as a plant which the islanders cultivated, and of which they made bread, p. 7. Gomara likewise afferts, that they were acquainted with the culture of maize. Histor. Gener. cap. 28. Oviedo describes maize without any intimation of its being a plant that was not natural to Hispaniola. Lib. vii.

NOTE LX. p. 16.

NEW HOLLAND, a country which formerly was only known, has lately been visited by intelligent observers. It lies in a region of the globe where it must enjoy a very favourable climate, as it stretches from the toth to the 38th degree of northern latitude. It is of great extent, and from its square form must be much more than equal to all Europe. The people who inhabit the various parts of it appear to be of one race. They are evidently ruder than most of the Americans, and have made still less progress in improvement and the arts of life. There is not the least appearance of cultivation in any part of this vast region. The inhabitants are extremely few, so that the country appears almost desolate. Their tribes are still more inconsiderable than those of America. They depend for subsistence, almost entirely, on fishing. They do not settle in one place, but roam about in quest of food. Both sexes go starknaked. Their habitations, utenfils, &c. are more fimple and rude than those of the Americans. Voyages. by Hawkesworth, iii. 622, &c. This, perhaps, is the country where man has been discovered in the earliest stage of his progress, and it exhibits a miserable specimen of his condition and powers in that uncultivated state. If this country shall be more fully explored by future navigators, the comparison of the manners of its inhabitants with those of the Americans will prove an instructive article in the history of the human species.

NOTE LXI. p. 16.

P. GABRIEL MAREST, who travelled from his flation among the Illinois to Machillimakinac, thus describes the face of the country: "We have marched twelve days without meeting a fingle human creature. Sometimes we found ourselves in vast meadows, of which we could not see the boundaries, through which there flowed many brooks and rivers, but without any path to conduct us. Sometimes we were obliged to open a passage across thick forests, through bushes, and underwood filled with briars and thorns. Sometimes we had to pass through deep marshes, in which we sunk up to the middle. After being satigued through the day, we had the earth for our bed, or a sew leaves, exposed to the wind, the rain, and all the injuries of the air." Lettr. Edistantes, ii. 360. Dr. Brickell, in an excursion from North Carolina towards the mountains, A. D. 1730, travelled fisteen days without meeting with a human creature. Nat. Hist. of North Carolina, 389. Diego de Ordas, in attempting to make a settlement in South America, A. D. 1532, marched fifty days through a country without one inhabitant. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. i. c. 11.

NOTE LXII. p. 17.

I STRONGLY suspect that a community of goods, and an undivided store, are known only among the rudest tribes of hunters; and that as soon as any species of agriculture or regular industry is known, the idea of an exclusive right of property to the fruits of them is introduced. I am confirmed in this opinion by accounts which I have received concerning the state of property among the Indians in very different regions of America. "The idea of the natives of Brasil concerning property is, that if any person cultivate a field, he alone ought to enjoy the produce of it, and no other has a title to pretend to it. If an individual or family go a-hunting or fishing, what is caught belongs to the individual or to the family, and they communicate no part of it to any but to their cazique, or to such of their kindred as happen to be indisposed. If any person in the village come to their hut, he may fit down freely, and eat without asking liberty. But this is the confequence of their general principle of hospitality; for I never observed any partition of the increase of their fields, or the produce of the chace, which I could confider as the refult of any idea concerning a community of goods. On the contrary, they are fo much attached. to what they deem to be their property, that it would be extremely dangerous to encroach upon it. As far as I have feen, or can learn, there is not one tribe of Indians in South America, among whom that community of goods which has been so highly extolled is known. The circumstance in the government of the Jesuits. most irksome to the Indians of Paraguay, was the community of goods which those fathers introduced. This was repugnant to the original ideas of the Indians. They were acquainted with the rights of private exclusive property, and they submitted with impatience to regulations which destroyed them." M, le Cheval, de Pinto, MS. penes me. " Actual possession (says a missionary who resided several years among the Indians of the Five Nations) gives a right to the foil, but whenever a possessor sees fit to quit it, another has as good right to take it as he who left it. This law, or custom, respects not only the particular spot on which he erects his house, but also his planting-ground. If a man has prepared a particular spot of ground, on which he defigns in future to build or plant, no man has a right to incommode him, much less to the fruit of his labours, until it appears that he voluntarily gives up his views. But I never heard of any formal conveyance from one Indian to another in their natural state. The limits of every canton are circumscribed; that is, they are allowed to hunt as far as such a river on this hand, and fuch a mountain on the other. This area is occupied and improved by individuals and their families. Individuals, not the community, have the use and profit of their own labours, or success in hunting." MS, of Mr. Gideon Hawley, penes me.

NOTE LXIII. p. 18.

This difference of temper between the Americans and negroes is fo remarkable, that it is a proverbial faying in the French islands, "Regarder un sauvage de travers, c'est le battre; le battre, c'est le tuer; battre un negre, c'est le nourrir." Tertre, ii. 490.

NOTE LXIV. p. 19.

THE description of the political state of the people of Cinaloa perfectly resembles that of the inhabitants of North America. "They have neither laws nor kings (fays a missionary who resided long among them) to punish any crime. Nor is there among them any species of authority, or political government, to restrain them in any part of their conduct. It is true, that they acknowledge certain Caziques, who are heads of their families or villages, but their authority appears chiefly in war, and the expeditions against their enemies. This authority the Caziques obtain not by hereditary right, but by their valour in war, or by the power and number of their families and relations. Sometimes they owe their pre-eminence to their eloquence in difplaying their own exploits." Ribas, Histor. de las Triumph. &c. p. 11. The flate of the Chiquitos in South America is nearly the same. "They have no regular form of government, or civil life; but in matters of public concern they liften to the advice of their old men. and usually follow it. The dignity of Cazique is not hereditary, but conferred according to merit, as the reward of valour in war. The union among them is imperfect. Their fociety refembles a republic without any head, in which every man is mafter of himself, and upon the least disgust, separates from those with whom he seemed to be connected." Relacion Historical de las Missiones de los Chiquitos, por P. Juan Patr. Fernandez, p. 32, 33. Thus, under very different climates, when nations are in a fimilar state of fociety, their institutions and civil government assume the same form.

NOTE LXV. p. 33.

"I HAVE known the Indians (fays a perfor well acquainted with their mode of life) to go a thousand miles miles for the purpose of revenge, in pathless woods, over hills and mountains, through huge cane swamps, exposed to the extremities of heat and cold, the vicisfitude of seasons, to hunger and thirst. Such is their over-boiling revengeful temper, that they utterly contemn all those things as imaginary trifles, if they are so happy as to get the scalp of the murderer, or enemy, to satisfy the craving ghosts of their deceased relations." Adair's Hist. of Amer. Indians, p. 150.

NOTE LXVI. p. 33.

In the account of the great war between the Algonquins and Iroquois, the atchievements of Piskaret, a famous chief of the Algonquins, performed mostly by himself alone, or with one or two companions, make a capital figure. De la Potherie, i. 297, &c. Colden's Hist. of Five Nations, 125, &c.

NOTE LXVII. p. 36.

THE life of an unfortunate leader is often in danger, and he is always degraded from the rank which he had acquired by his former exploits. Adair, p. 388.

NOTE LXVIII. p. 36.

As the ideas of the North Americans, with respect to the mode of carrying on war, are generally known, I have sounded my observations chiefly upon the testimony of the authors who describe them. But the same maxims took place among other nations in the New World. A judicious missionary has given a view of the military operations of the people in Gran Chaco, in South America, persectly similar to those of the Iroquois. "They are much addicted to war (says he), which they carry on frequently among themselves, but perpetually against the Spaniards. But they may rather be called thieves than soldiers, for they never make head against the Spaniards, unless when they can assault them by stealth, or have guarded against any mischance by spies, who may be called indefatigable; they will watch the fettlements of the Spaniards for one, two, or three years, observing by night every thing that passes with the utmost folicitude, whether they may expect refistance or not; and until they are perfectly fecure of the event, they will not venture upon an attack; fo that when they do give the affault, they are certain of success, and free from all danger. These spies, in order that they may not be observed, will creep on all-four like cats in the night; but if they are discovered, make their escape with much dexterity. But, although they never choose to face the Spaniards, if they be furrounded in any place, whence they cannot escape, they will fight with desperate valour, and fell their lives very dear." Lozano, Descrip. del Gran Chaco, p. 78.

NOTE LXIX. p. 37.

LERY, who was an eye-witness of the proceedings of the Toupinambos, a Brasilian tribe, in a war against a powerful nation of their enemies, describes their courage and ferocity in very striking terms: Ego cum Gallo altero, paulo curiofius, magno nostro periculo, (si enim ab hostibus capti aut lesi fuissemus, devorationi suissemus devoti,) barbaros nostros in militiam euntes comitari volui. Hi, numero 4000 capita, cum hostibus ad littus decertarunt, tanta ferocitate, ut vel rabidos et furiofos quosque superarent. Cum primum hostes conspexere, in magnos atque editos ululatus perruperunt. Hæc gens adeo fera est & truculenta, ut tantisper dum virium vel tantillum restat, continuo dimicent, fugamque nunquam capessant. Quod a natura illis inditum esse reor. Testor interea me, qui non femel, tum peditum tum equitum copias ingentes, in aciem instructas hic conspexi, tanta nunquam voluptate videndis peditum legionibus armis fulgentibus, quanta tum pugnantibus istis percussum fuisse. Lery, Hist. Navigat. in Brasil. ap. de Bry, iii. 207, 208, 209.

NOTE LXX. p. 38.

It was originally the practice of the Americans, as well as of other favage nations, to cut off the heads of the enemies whom they flew, and to carry them away as trophies. But, as they found these cumbersome in their retreat, which they always make very rapidly, and often through a vast extent of country, they became satisfied with tearing off their scalps. This custom, though most prevalent in North America, was not unknown among the Southern tribes. Lozano, p. 79.

NOTE LXXI. p. 43.

THE terms of the war fong feem to be dictated by the same herce spirit of revenge: "I go to war to revenge the death of my brothers; I shall kill; I shall exterminate; I shall burn my enemies; I shall bring away flaves; I shall devour their heart, dry their flesh, drink their blood; I shall tear off their scalps, and make cups of their skulls." Bossu's Travels through Louisiana, vol. i. p. 102. I am informed, by perfons on whose testimony I can rely, that as the number of people in the Indian tribes has decreafed so much, almost none of their prisoners are now put to death. It is considered as better policy to spare and to adopt them. Those dreadful scenes which I have described occur now so rarely, that missionaries and traders who have resided long among the Indians, never were witnesses them.

NOTE LXXII. p. 44.

ALL the travellers who have visited the most uncivilized of the American tribes, agree in this. It is confirmed by two remarkable circumstances, which occurred in the conquest of different provinces. In the expedition of Narvaez into Florida in the year 1528, the Spaniards were reduced to such extreme distress by famine, that, in order to preserve their own lives, they ate such of their companions as happened to die. This appeared so shocking to the natives, who were accustomed to devour none but prisoners, that it filled them with horror and indignation against the Spaniards. Torquemada, Monarch, Ind. ii. p. 584. Naustragios de Alv. Nugnez Cabeca de Vaca, c. xiv. p. 15. During the siege of Mexico, though the Mexicans devoured with greediness the Spaniards and Tlascalans, whom they took prisoners, the utmost rigour of the famine which they suffered could not induce them to touch the dead bodies of their own countrymen. Bern. Diaz. del Castillo Conquist. de la N. Espagna, p. 156.

NOTE LXXIII. p. 45.

MANY fingular circumstances concerning the treatment of prisoners among the people of Brasil, are contained in the narrative of Stadius, a German officer in the service of the Portuguese, published in the year 1556. He was taken prisoner by the Toupinambos, and remained in captivity nine years. He was often present at those horrid festivals which he describes, and was destined himself to the same cruel fate with other prifoners. But he faved his life by extraordinary efforts of courage and address. De Bry, iii. p. 34, &c. M. De Lery, who accompanied M. De Villegagnon in his expedition to Brasil, in the year 1556, and who resided some time in that country, agrees with Stadius in every circumstance of importance. He was frequently an eyewitness of the manner in which the Brasilians treated their prisoners. De Bry, iii. 210. Several striking particulars omitted by them are mentioned by a Portuguese author. Purch. Pilgr. iv. 1294, &c.

NOTE LXXIV. p. 48.

THOUGH I have followed that opinion concerning the apathy of the Americans, which appeared to me most rational, and supported by the authority of the most most respectable authors, other theories have been formed with regard to it, by writers of great eminence. D. Ant. Ulloa, in a late work, contends, that the texture of the skin and bodily habit of the Americans is such, that they are less sensible of pain than the rest of man-He produces several proofs of this, from the manner in which they endure the most cruel chirurgical operations, &c. Noticias Americanas, p. 313, 314. The same observation has been made by surgeons in Brafil. An Indian, they fay, never complains under pain, and will bear the amputation of a leg or arm without uttering a fingle groan. MS. penes me.

NOTE LXXV. p. 50.

THIS is an idea natural to all rude nations. Among the Romans, in the early periods of their commonwealth, it was a maxim that a prisoner, "tum decessisse videtur cum captus eft." Digeft. lib. xlix. tit. 15. c. 18. And afterwards, when the progress of refinement rendered them more indulgent with respect to this article, they were obliged to employ two fictions of law to fecure the property, and permit the return of a captive, the one by the Lex Cornelia, and the other by the Jus Postliminii, Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. fec. ord. Pand. ii. p. 294. Among the negroes the same ideas prevail. As foon No ransom was ever accepted for a prisoner. as one is taken in war he is reputed to be dead; and he is fo in effect to his country and his family. Voy. du Cheval, des Marchais, i. p. 369.

NOTE LXXVI. p. 51.

THE people of Chili, the most gallant and highspirited of all the Americans, are the only exception to this observation. They attack their enemies in the open field; their troops are ranged in regular order; their battalions advance to the charge not only with courage, but with discipline. The North Americans, though many of them have substituted the European fire-arms in place of their own bows and arrows, still adhere to their ancient maxims of war, and carry it on according to their own peculiar system. But the Chilese nearly resemble the warlike nations of Europe and Asia in their military operations. Ovalle's Relation of Chili. Church. Coll. iii. p. 71. Lozano's Hist. Parag. i. 144, 145.

NOTE LXXVII. p. 54.

HERRERA gives a remarkable proof of this. In Yucatan, the men are fo folicitous about their drefs, that they carry about with them mirrors, probably made of stone, like those of the Mexicans, Dec. iv. lib. iii. c. 8. in which they delight to view themselves; but the women never use them. Dec. iv. lib. x. c. 2. He takes notice, that among the fierce tribe of the Panches, in the new kingdom of Granada, none but diffinguished warriors were permitted either to pierce their lips and to wear green stones in them, or to adorn their heads with plumes of feathers. Dec. vii. lib. ix. c. 4. In some provinces of Peru, though that empire had made confiderable progress in civilization, the state of women was little improved. All the toil of cultivation and domestic work was devolved upon them, and they were not permitted to wear bracelets, or other ornaments, with which the men were fond of decking themselves. Zarate, Hist. de Peru, i. p. 15, 16.

NOTE LXXVIII. p. 55.

I HAVE ventured to call this mode of anointing and painting their bodies, the drefs of the Americans. This is agreeable to their own idiom. As they never stir abroad if they are not completely anointed; they excuse themselves when in this situation, by saying, that they cannot appear because they are naked. Gumilla, Hist. de l'Orenoque, i. 191.

NOTE LXXIX. p. 56.

Some tribes in the province of Cinaloa, on the gulf of California, feem to be among the rudest people of America united in the focial state. They neither cultivate nor fow; they have no houses in which they refide. Those in the inland country subfist by hunting sthose on the sea-coust chiefly by fishing. Both depend upon the spontaneous productions of the earth, fruits. plants, and roots of various kinds. In the rainy feafon, as they have no habitations to afford them shelter, they gather bundles of reeds, or strong grass, and binding them together at one end, they open them at the other, and fitting them to their heads, they are covered as with a large cap, which like a pent-house throws off the rain, and will keep them dry for feveral hours. During the warm feafon, they form a shed with the branches of trees, which protects them from the fultry rays of the fun. When exposed to cold they make large fires, round which they fleep in the open air. Historia de los Triumphos de Nuestra Santa Fè entre Gentes las mas barbaras, &c. por P. And, Perez de Ribas, p. 7, &c.

NOTE LXXX. p. 57.

THESE houses resemble barns. "We have meafured some which were a hundred and sifty paces long, and twenty paces broad. Above a hundred persons reside in some of them." Wilson's Account of Guiana. Purch. Pilgr. vol. iv. p. 1263. Ibid. 1291. "The Indian houses," says Mr. Barrere, "have a most wretched appearance, and are a striking image of the rudeness of early times. Their huts are commonly built on some rising ground, or on the banks of a river, huddled sometimes together, sometimes straggling and always without any order. Their aspect is melancholy and disagreeable. One sees nothing but what is hideous and savage. The uncultivated fields have no gaiety.

The filence which reigns there, unless when interrupted by the disagreeable notes of birds, or cries of wild beafts, is extremely dismal." Relat. de la France Equin. p. 146.

NOTE LXXXI. p. 59.

Some tribes in South America can fend their arrows to a great distance, and with considerable force, without the aid of the bow. They make use of a hollow reed, about nine feet long, and an inch thick, which is called a Sarbacane. In it they lodge a small arrow, with some unspun cotton wound about its great end; this confines the air, so that they can blow it with assonishing rapidity, and a sure aim, to the distance of above a hundred paces. These small arrows are always poisoned. Fermin. Descr. de Surin. i. 55. Bancrost's Histof Guiana, p. 281, &c. The Sarbacane is much used in some parts of the East Indies.

NOTE LXXXII. p. 59.

I MIGHT produce many inflances of this, but shall satisfy myself with one, taken from the Eskimaux. "Their greatest ingenuity (says Mr. Ellis) is shewn in the structure of their bows, made commonly of three pieces of wood, each making part of the same arch, very nicely and exactly joined together. They are commonly of fir or larch; and as this wants strength and elasticity, they supply both by bracing the back of the bow, with a kind of thread, or line, made of the sinews of their deer, and the bow-string of the same materials. To make them draw more stiffly, they sip them into water, which causes both the back of the bow and the string to contract, and consequently gives it the greater force; and as they practise from their youth, they shoot with very great dexterity." Voyage to Hudson's Bay, p. 138-

NOTE LXXXIII. p. 60.

NECESSITY is the great prompter and guide of mankind in their inventions. There is, however, such inequality in some parts of their progress, and some nations get so far the start of others in circumstances nearly similar, that we must ascribe this to some events in their story, or to some peculiarity in their situation with which we are unacquainted. The people in the island of Otaheite, lately discovered in the South Sea, far excel most of the Americans in the knowledge and practice of the arts of ingenuity, and yet they had not invented any method of boiling water; and having no vessel that would bear the fire, they had no more idea that water could be made hot, than that it could be made solid. Voyages by Hawkesworth, i. 466. 484.

NOTE LXXXIV. p. 60.

ONE of these boats, which could carry nine men, weighed only sixty pounds. Gosnol. Relat. des Voy. a la Virgin. Rec. de Voy. au Nord, tom. v. p. 403.

NOTE LXXXV. p. 62.

A REMARKABLE proof of this is produced by Ulloa. In weaving hammocks, coverlets, and the other coarse cloaths, which they are accustomed to manufacture, their industry has discovered no more expeditious method, than to take up thread after thread, and after counting and forting them each time, to pass the woof between them, so that in finishing a small piece of those fluffs, they frequently spend more than two years. Voyage, i. 336. Bancroft gives the same description of the Indians of Guiana, p. 255. According to Adair, the ingenuity and dispatch of the North American Indians are not greater, p. 422. From one of the engravings of the Mexican paintings in Purchas, vol. iii. p. 1106, I think it probable that the people of Mexico were unacquainted with any better or more expeditious expeditious mode of weaving. A loom was an invention beyond the ingenuity of the most improved Americans. In all their works they advance so slowly, that one of their artists is two months at a tobacco-pipe with his knife before he finishes it. Adair, p. 423.

NOTE LXXXVI. p. 64.

THE article of religion in P. Lafitau's Mœurs des Sauvages, extends to 347 tedious pages in quarto.

NOTE LXXXVII. p. 66.

I HAVE referred the reader to several of the authors who describe the most uncivilized nations in America. Their testimony is uniform. That of P. Ribas concerning the people of Cinaloa, coincides with the rest. "I was extremely attentive (fays he) during the years I resided among them, to ascertain whether they were to be confidered as idolaters; and it may be affirmed with the most perfect exactness, that though among some of them there may be traces of idolatry, yet others have not the least knowledge of God, or even of any false deity, nor pay any formal adoration to the Supreme Being, who exercises dominion over the world; nor have they any conception of the providence of a Creator or Governor, from whom they expect in the next life, the reward of their good, or the punishment of their evil deeds. Neither do they publicly join in any act of divine worship." Ribas, Triumphos, &c. p. 16.

NOTE LXXXVIII. p. 67.

AT Mary Deaths

THE people of Brasil were so much affrighted by thunder, which is frequent and awful in their country, as well as in other parts of the torrid zone, that it was not only the object of religious reverence; but the most expressive name in their language for the Deity, was Toupan, the same by which they distinguished thunder. Piso de Medcc. Brasil, p. 8. Nieuhoff. Church. Coll. ii. p. 132.

NOTE LXXXIX. p. 74.

By the account which M. Dumont, an eye witness, gives of the funeral of the great chief of the Natchez, it appears, that the feelings of the persons who suffered on that occasion were very different. Some solicited the honour with eagerness; others laboured to avoid their doom, and several saved their lives by slying to the woods. As the Indian Bramins give an intoxicating draught to the women, who are to be burnt together with the bodies of their husbands, which renders them insensible of their approaching sate, the Natchez obliged their victims to swallow several large pills of tobacco, which produce a similar effect. Mem. de Louis, i. 227.

NOTE XC. p. 82.

On fome occasions, particularly in dances instituted for the recovery of persons who are indisposed, they are extremely licentious and indecent. De la Potherie, Hist. &c. ii. p. 42. Charley. N. Fr. iii. p. 319. But the nature of their dances is commonly such as I have described.

NOTE XCI. p. 83.

THE Otheracoas, a tribe seated on the banks of the Orinoco, employ for the same purpose a composition, which they call Yupa. It is formed of the seeds of an unknown plant, reduced to powder, and certain shells burnt and pulverized. The effects of this when drawn up into the nostrils are so violent, that they resemble madness rather than intoxication. Gumilla, i. 286.

NOTE XCII. p. 86.

THOUGH this observation holds true among the greater part of the southern tribes, there are some in which the intemperance of the women is as excessive as that of the men. Bancrost's Nat. Hist. of Guiana, p. 275.

NOTE XCIII. p. 91.

EVEN in the most intelligent writers concerning the manners of the Americans, one meets with inconfiftent and inexplicable circumstances. The Jesuit Charlevoix. who, in consequence of the controversy between his order and that of the Franciscans, with respect to the talents and abilities of the North Americans, is disposed to represent their intellectual as well as moral qualities in the most favourable light, afferts, that they are engaged in continual negotiations with their neighbours. and conduct these with the most refined address. At the same time he adds, "that it behoves their envoys or plenipotentiaries to exert their abilities and eloquence. for if the terms which they offer are not accepted of. they had need to stand on their guard. It frequently happens, that a blow with a hatchet is the only return given to their propositions. The envoy is not out of danger even if he is so fortunate as to avoid the stroke. he may expect to be purfued, and if taken, to be burnt." Hift. N. Fr. iii. 251. What occurs vol. ii. p. 161. concerning the manner in which the Tlascalans treated the ambassadors from Zempoalla, corresponds with the fact related by Charlevoix. Men capable of such acts of violence, feem to be unacquainted with the first principles upon which the intercourse between nations is founded; and instead of the perpetual negotiations which Charlevoix mentions, it feems almost impossible that there should be any correspondence whatever among them.

NOTE XCIV. p. 93.

It is a remark of Tacitus concerning the Germans, "Gaudent muneribus, fed nec data imputant, nec acceptis obligantur." C. 21. An author who had a good opportunity of observing the principle which leads savages neither to express gratitude for favours which they had received, nor to expect any return for such as they bestowed, thus explains their ideas: "If, say they, they, you give me this, it is because you have no need of it yourself; and as for me, I never part with that which I think necessary to me." Memoir sur le Galibis; Hist. des Plantes de la Guiane Francoise par M. Aublet, tom. ii. p. 110.

NOTE XCV. p. 106.

AND. BERNALDES, the contemporary and friend of Columbus, has preferved some circumstances concerning the bravery of the Caribbees, which are not mentioned by Don Ferdinand Columbus, or the other historians of that period, whose works have been published. Caribbean canoe, with four men, two women, and a boy, fell in unexpectedly with the fleet of Columbus in his second voyage, as it was steering through their islands. At first they were struck almost stupid with aftonishment at such a strange spectacle, and hardly moved from the spot for above an hour. A Spanish bark, with twenty five men, advanced towards them, and the fleet gradually furrounded them, so as to cut off their communication with the shore. "When they faw that it was impossible to escape, (fays the historian.) they feized their arms with undaunted refolution, and began the attack.

"I use the expression, with undaunted resolution, for they were sew, and beheld a vast number ready to assault them. They wounded several of the Spaniards, although they had targets, as well as other desensive armour; and even after their canoe was overset, it was with no little difficulty and danger that part of them were taken, as they continued to desend themselves, and to use their bows with great dexterity while swimming in the sea."

Hist. de D. Fern. y Ysab. MSS. c. 119.

NOTE XCVI. p. 106.

A PROBABLE conjecture may be formed with refpect to the cause of the distinction in character between the Caribbees and the inhabitants of the larger islands.

The

The former appear manifestly to be a separate race. Their language is totally different from that of their neighbours in the large islands. They themselves have a tradition, that their ancestors came originally from some part of the continent, and having conquered and exterminated the ancient inhabitants, took possession of their lands, and of their women. Rochefort, 384. Tertre, 360. Hence they call themselves Banaree, which fignifies a man come from beyond fea. Labat. vi. 131. Accordingly, the Caribbees still use two distinct languages, one peculiar to the men, and the other to the women. Tertre, 261. The language of the men has nothing common with that spoken in the large islands. The dialect of the women considerably refembles it. Labar. 129. This strongly confirms the tradition which I have mentioned. The Caribbees themfelves imagine, that they were a colony from the Galibis. a powerful nation of Guiana, in South America. Tertre, 361. Rochefort, 348. But as their fierce manners approach nearer to those of the people in the northern continent, than to those of the natives of South America; and as their language has likewife fome affinity to that spoken in Florida, their origin should be deduced rather from the former than from the latter. Labat. 128, &c. Herrera, dec. i. lib. ix. c. 4. In their wars, they still observe their ancient practice of destroying all the males, and preferving the women either for fervitude or for breeding.

NOTE XCVII. p. 107.

Our knowledge of the events which happened in the conquest of New Spain, is derived from sources of information more original and authentic than that of any transaction in the history of America. The letters of Cortes to the emperor Charles V. are an historical monument, not only first in order of time, but of the greatest authenticity and value. As Cortes early assumed a command independent of Velasquez, it became necessary to convey such an account of his operations to Madrid.

Madrid, as might procure him the approbation of his fovereign.

The first of his dispatches has never been made public. It was fent from Vera Cruz, July 16th, 1519. As I imagined that it might not reach the emperor, until he arrived in Germany, for which he fet out early in the year 1520, in order to receive the Imperial crown; I made diligent fearth for a copy of this difpatch, both in Spain and in Germany, but without success. This, however, is of less consequence, as it could not contain any thing very material, being written fo foon after Cortes arrived in New Spain, But, in fearthing for the letter from Cortes, a copy of one from the colony of Vera-Cruz to the emperor has been difcovered in the Imperial library at Vienna. Of this I have given fome account in its proper place, vol. ii. p. 141. The fecond dispatch, dated October 30th, 1520, was published at Seville, A. D. 1522, and the third and fourth foon after they were received. A Latin translation of them appeared in Germany, A. D. 1572. Ramufio foon after made them more generally known, by inferting them in his valuable collection. They contain a regular and minute history of the expedition, with many curious particulars concerning the policy and manners of the Mexicans. The work does honour to Cortes; the flyle is fimple and perspicuous; but as it was manisestly his interest to represent his own actions in the fairest light, his victories are probably exaggerated, his loffes diminished, and his acts of rigour and violence foftened.

The next in order is the Chronica de la Neuva Espagna, by Francisco Lopez de Gomara, published A. D. 1554. Gomara's historical merit is considerable. His mode of narration is clear, slowing, always agreeable, and sometimes elegant. But he is frequently inaccurate and credulous; and as he was the domestic chaplain of Cortes after his return from New Spain, and probably composed his work at his desire, it is manifest that he labours to magnify the merit of his hero, and to conceal or extenuate such transactions as were unfavourable to his character. Of this Herrera accuses him in one instance. Dec. ii. lib. iii. c. 2. and it is not once only that this is conspicuous. He writes, however, with so much freedom concerning several measures of the Spanish court, that the copies both of his Historia de las Indias, and of his Chronica, were called in by a decree of the council of the Indies, and they were long considered as prohibited books in Spain; it is only of late that licence to print them has been granted. Pinelo, Biblioth. 589.

The Chronicle of Gomara induced Bernal Diaz del Castillo to compose his Historia Verdadera de la Conquista de la Nueva Espagna. He had been an adventurer in each of the expeditions to New Spain, and was the companion of Cortes in all his battles and perils. When he found that neither he himself, nor many of his fellow-foldiers, were once mentioned by Gomara, but that the fame of all their exploits was ascribed to Cortes; the gallant veteran laid hold of his pen with indignation, and composed his true history. It contains a prolix, minute, confused narrative of all 'Cortes's operations, in fuch a rude vulgar style as might be expected from an illiterate foldier. But as he relates transactions of which he was witness, and in which he performed a confiderable part, his account bears all the marks of authenticity, and is accompanied with fuch a pleasant naiveté, with such interesting details, with such amufing vanity, and yet fo pardonable in an old foldier who had been (as he boafts) in a hundred and nineteen battles, as renders his book one of the most fingular that is to be found in any language.

Pet. Martyr ab Angleria, in a treatife de Insulis nuper inventis, added to his Decades de Rebus Oceanicis & Novo Orbe, gives some account of Cortes's expedition. But he proceeds no farther than to relate what happened after his first landing. This work, which is brief and slight, seems to contain the information transmitted by Cortes in his first dispatches, embellished with several particulars communicated to the author by the officers who brought the letters from Cortes.

But the book to which the greater part of modern historians have had recourse for information concerning the conquest of New Spain, is Historia de la Conquista de Mexico, por D. Antonio de Solis, first published A.D. 1684. I know no author in any language whose literary fame has rifen fo far beyond his real merit. De Solis is reckoned by his countrymen one of the purelt writers in the Castilian tongue; and if a foreigner may venture to give his opinion concerning a matter of which Spaniards alone are qualified to judge, he is entitled to that praise. But, though his language be correct, his taste in composition is far from being just. His periods are fo much laboured as to be often stiff, and fometimes tumid: the figures which he employs by way of ornament, are frequently trite or improper, and his obfervations superficial. These blemithes, however, might eafily be overlooked, if he were not defective with respect to all the great qualities of an historian. Destitute of that patient industry in refearch, which conducts to the knowledge of truth; a stranger to that impartiality which weighs evidence with cool attention; and ever eager to establish his favourite system of exalting the character of Cortes into that of a perfect hero, exempt from error, and adorned with every virtue; he is less solicitous to discover what was true, than to relate what might appear splendid. When he attempts any critical discussion, his reasonings are fallacious, and sounded upon an imperfect view of facts. Though he fometimes quotes the dispatches of Cortes, he seems not to have confulted them; and though he fets out with some censure on Gomara, he frequently prefers his authority, the most doubtful of any, to that of the other contemporary historians.

But of all the Spanish writers, Herrera furnishes the fullest and most accurate information concerning the conquest of Mexico, as well as every other transaction of America. The industry and attention with which he

confulred

confulted not only the books, but the original papers and public records, which tended to throw any light upon the subject of his inquiries, were so great, and he usually judges of the evidence before him with fo much impartiality and candour, that his decads may be ranked among the most judicious and useful historical collections. If, by attempting to relate the various occurrences in the New World in a strict chronological order, the arrangement of events in his work had not been rendered fo perplexed, disconnected, and obscure, that it is an unpleasant task to collect from different parts of his book, and piece together the detached shreds of a story, he might justly have been ranked among the most eminent historians of his country. He gives an account of the materials from which he composed his work, Dec. vi. lib. iii. c. 19.

NOTE XCVIII. p. 110.

CORTES purposed to have gone in the train of Ovando when he set out for his government in the year 1502, but was detained by an accident. As he was attempting in a dark night to scramble up to the window of a lady's bed-chamber, with whom he carried on an intrigue, an old wall, on the top of which he had mounted, gave way, and he was so much bruised by the fall as to be unsit for the voyage. Gomara, Cronica de la Nueva Espagna, cap. 1.

NOTE XCIX. p. 112.

CORTES had two thousand peros in the hands of Andrew Duero, and he borrowed four thousand. These some are about equal in value to fifteen hundred pounds sterling; but as the price of every thing was extremely high in America, they made but a scanty stock when applied towards the equipment of a military expedition. Herrera, dec. ii. lib. iii. c. 2. B. Diaz, c. 20.

NOTE C. p. 116.

THE names of those gallant officers which will often occur in the subsequent story, were Juan Velasquez de Leon, Alonso Hernandez Portocarrero, Francisco de Montejo, Christoval de Olid, Juan de Escalante, Francisco de Morla, Pedro de Alvarado, Francisco de Salceda, Juan de Escobar, Gines de Nortes. Cortes himsels commanded the Capitana, or Admiral. Francisco de Orozco, an officer formed in the wars of Italy, had the command of the artillery. The experienced Alaminos acted as chief pilot.

NOTE CI. p. 118.

In those different conflicts, the Spaniards lost only two men, but had a confiderable number wounded. Though there be no occasion for recourse to any supernatural cause to account either for the greatness of their victories, or the fmallness of their loss; the Spanish hiftorians fail not to ascribe both to the patronage of St. Jago, the tutelar Saint of their country, who, as they relate, fought at the head of their countrymen, and by his prowess gave a turn to the fate of the battle. Gomara is the first who mentions this apparition of St. James. It is amufing to observe the embarrassment of B. Diaz de Castillo, occasioned by the struggle between his superstition and his veracity. The former disposed him to believe this miracle; the latter restrained him from attesting it. "I acknowledge," fays he, "that all our exploits and victories are owing to our Lord Jesus Christ, and that in this battle there was such a number of Indians to every one of us, that if each had thrown a handful of earth they might have buried us, if by the great mercy of God we had not been protected. It may be that the person whom Gomara ment ons as having appeared on a mottled grey horse, was the glorious apostle Signor San Jago or Signor San Pedro, and that I, as being a finner, was not worthy to fee him. This I know, that I faw Francisca de Morla on such a horfe, horse, but as an unworthy transgressor, did not deserve to see any of the holy apostles. It may have been the will of God, that it was so as Gomara relates, but until I read his Chronicle I never heard among any of the conquerors that such a thing had happened." Cap. 34.

NOTE CII. p. 124.

Several Spanish historians relate this occurrence in such terms, as if they wished it should be believed, that the Indians, loaded with the presents, had carried them from the capital in the same short space of time that the couriers performed that journey. This is incredible, and Gomara mentions a circumstance which shews, that nothing extraordinary happened on this occasion. This rich present had been prepared for Grijalva, when he touched at the same place some months before, and was now ready to be delivered, as soon as Montezuma sent orders for that purpose. Gomara, Cron. c. xxvii. p. 28.

According to B. Diaz del Castillo, the value of the filver plate representing the moon, was alone above twenty thousand pesos, about five thousand pounds sterling.

NOTE CIII. p. 130.

This private traffic was directly contrary to the inflictions of Velasquez, who enjoined, that whatever was acquired by trade should be thrown into the common stock. But it appears, that the soldiers had each a private affortment of toys, and other goods proper for the Indian trade, and Cortes gained their favour by encouraging this under hand barter. B. Diaz, c. 41.

NOTE CIV. p. 143.

GOMARA has published a catalogue of the various articles of which this present consisted. Cron. c. 49. P. Martyr ab Angleria, who saw them after they were brought to Spain, and who seems to have examined which is curious, as it conveys some idea of the progress which the Mexicans had made in several arts of elegance. De Insulis nuper inventis Liber, p. 354, &c.

NOTE CV. p. 150.

THERE is no circumstance in the history of the conquest of America, which is more questionable than the account of the numerous armies brought into the field against the Spaniards. As the war with the republic of Tlascala, though of short duration, was one of the most confiderable which the Spaniards waged in America, the account given of the Tlascalan armies merits some attention. The only authentic information concerning this is derived from three authors. Cortes, in his fecond dispatch to the emperor, dated at Segura de la Frontera, October 30, 1520, thus estimates the number of their troops; in the first battle 6000; in the second battle 100,000; in the third battle 150,000. Relat. ap. Ramuf. iii. 228. Bernal Diaz del Caftillo, who was an eye-witness, and engaged in all the actions of this war, thus reckons their numbers; in the first battle 3000, p. 43; in the second battle 6000, ibid.; in the third battle 50,000, p. 45. Gomara, who was Cortes's chaplain after his return to Spain, and published his Cronica in 1552, follows the computation of Cortes, except in the fecond battle, where he reckons the Tlascalans at 80,000, p. 49. It was manifestly the interest of Cortes to magnify his own dangers and exploits. For it was only by the merit of extraordinary fervices, that he could hope to atone for his irregular conduct, in affuming an independent command. Bern. Diaz, though abundantly disposed to place his own prowefs, and that of his fellow-conquerors, in the most advantageous point of light, had not the same temptation to exaggerate; and it is probable, that his account of the numbers approaches nearer to the truth. The affembling of an army of 150,000 men requires many previous arrangements, and fuch provision for their their subsistence as seems to be beyond the foresight of Americans. The degree of cultivation in Tlascala does not seem to have been so great, as to have furnished such a vast army with provisions. Though this province was so much better cultivated than other regions of New Spain, that it was called the country of bread; yet the Spaniards in their march suffered such want, that they were obliged to subsist upon Tunas, a species of fruit which grows wild in the fields. Herrera, Dec. ii. lib. vi. c. 5. p. 182.

NOTE CVI. p. 154.

THESE unhappy victims are faid to be persons of distinction. It seems improbable that so great a number as fifty should be employed as spies. So many prisoners had been taken and dismissed, and the Tlascalans had fent so many messages to the Spanish quarters, that there appears to be no reason for hazarding the lives of fo many confiderable people, in order to procure information about the position and state of their camp. The barbarous manner in which Cortes treated a people unacquainted with the laws of war established among polished nations, appears so shocking to the later Spanish writers, that they diminish the number of those whom he punished so cruelly. Herrera says, that he cut off the hands of seven, and thumbs of some more. Dec. ii. lib. ii. c. 8. De Solis relates, that the hands of fourteen or fifteen were cut off, and the thumbs of all the reft. Lib. ii. c. 20. But Cortes himself, Relat. p. 228, b. and after him Gomara, c. 48, affirm, that the hands of all the fifty were cut off.

NOTE CVII. p. 156.

THE horses were objects of the greatest assonishment to all the people of New Spain. At first they imagined the horse and his rider, like the Centaurs of the ancients, to be some monstrous animal of a terrible form; and supposing that their food was the same as that of men, brought fiesh and bread to nourish them. Even after they discovered their mistake, they believed the horses devoured men in battle, and when they neighed, thought that they were demanding their prey. It was not the interest of the Spaniards to undeceive them. Herrera, dec. ii. lib. vi. c. 11.

NOTE CVIII. p. 162.

ACCORDING to Bart. de las Casas, there was no reason for this massacre, and it was an act of wanton cruelty, perpetrated merely to firike terror into the people of New Spain. Relac, de la Destruyc. p. 17, &c. But the zeal of Las Casas often leads him to exaggerate. In opposition to him, Bern, Diaz, c. 83, afferts, that the first missionaries sent into New Spain by the emperor, made a judicial inquiry into this transaction; and having examined the priefts and elders of Cholula, found that there was a real conspiracy to cut off the Spaniards, and that the account given by Cortes was exactly true. As it was the object of Cortes at that time, and manifeflly his interest, to gain the good will of Montezuma. it is improbable, that he should have taken a step which tended to visibly to alienate him from the Spaniards, if he had not believed it to be necessary for his own prefervation. At the same time, the Spaniards who served in America had fuch contempt for the natives, and thought them so little entitled to the common rights of men, that Cortes might hold the Cholulans to be guilty upon flight and impertect evidence. The feverity of the punishment was certainly excessive and atrocious.

NOTE CIX. p. 163.

This description is taken almost literally from Bernal Diaz del Castillo, who was so unacquainted with the art of composition, as to be incapable of embellishing his narrative. He relates in a simple and rude style what passed in his own mind, and that of his fellow-foldiers, on that occasion: "And let it not be thought strange, strange, says he, that I should write in this manner of what then happened, for it ought to be considered, that it is one thing to relate, another to have beheld things that were never before seen, or heard, or spoken of among men." Cap. 86. p. 64, b.

NOTE CX. p. 175.

B. DIAS del Castillo gives us some idea of the fatigue and hardships they underwent in performing this, and other parts of duty. During the nine months that they remained in Mexico, every man, without any diffinction between officers and foldiers, flept on his arms in his quilted jacket and gorget. They lay on mats, or fraw spread on the floor, and each was obliged to hold himself as alert as if he had been on guard. "This," adds he, 66 became fo habitual to me, that even now in my advanced age, I always fleep in my clothes, and never in any bed. When I visit my Encomienda, I reckon it suitable to my rank, to have a bed carried along with my other baggage, but I never go into it; but, according to custom, I lie in my clothes, and walk frequently during the night into the open air, to view the flars as I was wont when in fervice." Cap. 108.

NOTE CXI. p. 178.

Cortes himself, in his second dispatch to the emperor, does not explain the motives which induced him either to condemn Qualpopoca to the stames, or to put Montezuma in irons. Ramus. iii. 236. B. Diaz is silent with respect to his reasons for the former; and the only cause he assigns for the latter was, that he might meet with no interruption in executing the sentence pronounced against Qualpopoca, c. xcv. p. 75. But as Montezuma was his prisoner, and absolutely in his power, he had no reason to dread him, and the insult offered to that monarch could have no effect but to irritate him unnecessarily. Gomara supposes, that Cortes had no other object than to occupy Montezuma

with

with his own distress and sufferings, that he might give less attention to what befel Qualpopoca. Cron. c. 89. Herrera adopts the same opinion. Dec. ii. lib. viii. c. 9. But it seems an odd expedient, in order to make a person bear one injury, to load him with another that is greater. De Solis imagines, that Cortes had nothing else in view than to intimidate Montezuma, so that he might make no attempt to rescue the victims from their fate; but the spirit of that monarch was fo submissive, and he had so tamely given up the prisoners to the disposal of Cortes, that he had no cause to apprehend any opposition from him. If the explanation which I have attempted to give of Cortes's proceedings on this occasion be not admitted, it appears to me, that they must be reckoned among the wanton and barbarous acts of oppression which occur too often in the history of the conquest of America.

NOTE CXII. p. 182.

DE Solis afferts, lib. iv. c. 3. that the proposition of doing homage to the King of Spain, came from Montezuma himself, and was made in order to induce the Spaniards to depart out of his dominions. He describes his conduct on this occasion, as if it had been founded upon a scheme of profound policy, and executed with fuch refined address, as to deceive Cortes himself. But there is no hint or circumstance in the contemporary historians, Cortes, Diaz, or Gomara, to justify this Montezuma on other occasions discovered no fuch extent of art and abilities. The anguish which he felt in performing this humbling ceremony is natural, if we suppose it to have been involuntary. But, according to the theory of De Solis, which supposes that Montezuma was executing what he himself had proposed, to have assumed an appearance of forrow, would have been preposterous and inconsistent with his own defign of deceiving the Spaniards.

NOTE CXIII. p. 185.

In feveral of the provinces, the Spaniards, with all their industry and influence, could collect no gold. others, they procured only a few trinkets of small Montezuma affured Cortes, that the prefent which he offered to the king of Castile, after doing homage, confifted of all the treasure amassed by his father; and told him, that he had already distributed the rest of his gold and jewels among the Spaniards. B. Diaz, c. 104. Gomara relates, that all the filver collected amounted to 500 marks. Cron. c. 02. agrees with the account given by Cortes, that the royal fifth of filver was 100 marks. Relat. 239, B. So that the fum total of filver was only 4000 ounces, at the rate of eight ounces a mark, which demonstrates the proportion of filver to gold to have been exceedingly fmall.

NOTE CXIV. p. 186.

DE Solis, lib. iv. c. I. calls in question the truth of this transaction, from no better reason than that it was inconfishent with that prudence which distinguishes the character of Cortes. But he ought to have recollected the impetuofity of his zeal at Tlascala, which was no less imprudent. He afferts, that the evidence for it rests upon the testimony of B. Diaz del Castillo, of Gomara, and of Herrera. They all concur indeed, in mentioning this inconfiderate step which Cortes took; and they had good reason to do so, for Cortes himself relates this exploit in his fecond dispatch to the emperor, and feems to glory in it. Cort. Relat. Ramuf, iii. 140, D. This is one instance, among many, of De Solis's having confulted with little attention the letters of Cortes to Charles V. from which the most authentic information with respect to his operations must be derived.

NOTE CXV. p. 190.

HERRERA and De Solis suppose, that Velasquez was encouraged to equip this armament against Cortes, by the accounts which he received from Spain concerning the reception of the agents fent by the colony of Vera Cruz, and the warmth with which Fonseca bishop of Burgos had espoused his interest, and condemned the proceedings of Cortes. Herrera, dec. ii. lib. ix. c. 18. De Solis, lib. iv. c. 5. But the chronological order of events refutes this supposition. Portocarrero and Montejo Sailed from Vera Cruz, July 26, 1519. Herrera, dec. ii. lib. v. c. 4. They landed at St. Lucar in October, according to Herrera, ibid. But P. Martyr, who attended the court at that time, and communicated every occurrence of moment to his correspondents day by day. mentions the arrival of these agents for the first time, in December, and speaks of it as a recent event. Epift. 650. All the historians agree, that the agents of Cortes had their first audience of the Emperor at Tordefillas, when he went to that town to vifit his mother in his way to St. Jago de Compostella. Herrera, dec. ii. lib. v. c. 4. De Solis, lib. iv. c. 4. But the emperor fet out from Valladolid for Tordefillas, on the 11th of March 1520; and P. Martyr mentions his having feen at that time the presents made to Charles, Epist. 1665. The armament under Narvaez failed from Cuba in April 1520. It is manifest then, that Velasquez could not receive any account of what passed in this interview at Tordefillas, previous to his hostile preparations against Cortes. His real motives seem to be those which I have mentioned. The patent appointing him Adelantado of New Spain, with such extensive powers, bears date November 3, 1519. Herrera, dec. ii. lib. iii. c. 11. He might receive it about the beginning of January. Gomara takes notice, that as foon as this patent was delivered to him, he began to equip a fleet and levy forces. Cron. c. 96.

NOTE CXVI. p. 193.

DE Solis contends, that as Narvaez had no interpreters, he could hold no intercourse with the people of the provinces, nor converse with them in any way but by figns, and that it was equally impossible for him to carry on any communication with Montezuma. Lib. iv. c. vii. But it is upon the authority of Cortes himself that I relate all the particulars of Narvaez's correspondence both with Montezuma and with his subjects in the maritime provinces. Relat. Ramus. iii. 242, A.C. Cortes affirms, that there was a mode of intercourse between Narvaez and the Mexicans, but does not explain how it was carried on. Bernal Diaz supplies this defect, and informs us, that the three deferters who joined Narvaez acted as interpreters, having acquired a competent knowledge of the language, c. 110. With his usual minuteness, he mentions their names and characters, and relates, in chapter 122, how they were punished for their perfidy. The Spaniards had now resided above a year among the Mexicans; and it is not furprifing, that feveral among them should have made fome proficiency in speaking their language. This seems to have been the case. Herrera, dec. ii. lib. x. c. r. Both B. Diaz, who was present, and Herrera, the most accurate and best informed of all the Spanish writers, agree with Cortes in his account of the fecret correspondence carried on with Montezuma. Dec. ii. lib. ix. c. 18, 19. De Solis seems to consider it as a discredit to Cortes, his hero, that Montezuma should have been ready to engage in a correspondence with Narvaez. He supposes that monarch to have contracted such a wonderful affection for the Spaniards, that he was not folicitous to be delivered from them. After the indig-nity with which he had been treated, such an affection is incredible; and even De Solis is obliged to acknowledge, that it must be looked upon as one of the miracles which God had wrought to facilitate the conquest. lib. iv. c. 7. The truth is, Montezuma, however much overawed by his dread of the Spaniards, was extremely impatient to recover his liberty.

NOTE CXVII. p. 208.

THESE words I have borrowed from the anonymous Account of the European Settlements in America, published by Dodsley, in two volumes, 8vo. a work of so much merit, that I should think there is hardly any writer in the age who ought to be ashamed of acknowledging himself to be the author of it.

NOTE CXVIII. p. 214.

THE contemporary historians differ confiderably with respect to the loss of the Spaniards on this occasion. Cortes, in his fecond dispatch to the emperor, makes the number only 150. Relat. ap. Ramuf. iii. p. 249, A: But it was manifestly his interest, at that juncture, to conceal from the court of Spain the full extent of the loss which he had sustained. De Solis, always studious to diminish every missortune that befel his countrymen, rates their lofs at about two hundred men, lib. iv. c. 19. B. Diaz affirms, that they lost 870 men, and that only 440 escaped from Mexico. c. 128. p. 108, B. Palafox, bishop of Los Angeles, who feems to have enquired into the early transactions of his countrymen in New Spain with great attention, confirms the account of B. Diaz, with respect to the extent of their loss. Virtudes del Indio, p. 22. Gomara states their loss at 450 men. Cron. c. 109. Some months afterwards, when Cortes had received feveral reinforcements, he mustered his troops, and found them to be only 500. Relat. ap. Ramus. iii. p. 255, E. Now, as Narvaez brought 880 men into ew Spain, and about 400 of Cortes's foldiers were then alive, it is evident, that his loss, in the retreat frem Mexico, must have been much more considerable than what he mentions. B. Diaz, folicitous to magnify the dangers and fufferings to which he and his fellowconquerors were exposed, may have exaggerated their loss; but, in my opinion, it cannot well be estimated at less than 600 men.

NOTE CXIX. p. 234.

Some remains of this great work are still visible, and the spot where the brigantines were built and launched, is still pointed out to strangers. Torquemada viewed them. Monarq Indiana, vol. i. p. 531.

NOTE CXX. p. 242.

THE station of Alvarado on the causeway of Tacuba was the nearest to the city. Cortes observes, that there they could distinctly observe what passed when their countrymen were facrificed. Relat. ap. Ramus. iii. p. 271, E. B. Diaz, who belonged to Alvarado's division, relates what he beheld with his own eyes, C. 152. p. 148, b. 149, a. Like a man whose courage was fo clear as to be above suspicion, he describes with his usual simplicity the impression which this spectacle made upon him. "Before," fays he, "I faw the breafts of my companions opened, their hearts, yet fluttering, offered to an accurfed idol, and their flesh devoured by their exulting enemies; I was accustomed to enter a battle not only without fear, but with high spirit. But from that time I never advanced to fight the Mexicans without a fecret horror and anxiety; my heart trembled at the thoughts of the death which I had seen them suffer." He takes care to add, that as foon as the combat began, his terror went off; and, indeed, his adventurous bravery on every occasion is full evidence of this. B. Diaz, c. 156. p. 157, a.

NOTE CXXI. p. 248.

ONE circumstance in this siege merits particular notice. The account which the Spanish writers give of the numerous armies employed in the attack or defence of Mexico, seems to be incredible. According to Cortes himself, he had at one time 150,000 auxiliary Indians in his service. Relat. Ramus. iii. 275, E. Gomara afferts, that they were above 200,000. Cron.

VOL. 11. QQ ... c. 136.

c. 136. Herrera, an author of higher authority, fays, they were about 200,000. Dec. iii, lib. i. c. 10. None of the contemporary writers afcertain explicitly the number of persons in Mexico during the siege. But Cortes on feveral occasions mentions the number of Mexicans who were flain, or who perished for want of food; and, if we may rely on those circumstances, it is probable that above two hundred thousand must have been that up in the town. But the quantity of provisions necessary for the subfishence of such wast multitudes affembled in one place during three months, is fo great, and it requires so much foresight and arrangement to collect these, and lay them up in magazines, so as to be certain of a regular supply, that one can hardly believe that this could be accomplished in a country where agriculture was fo imperfect as in the Mexican empire, where there were no tame animals, and by a people naturally fo improvident, and fo incapable of executing a complicated plan as the most improved Americans. The Spaniards, with all their care and attention, fared very poorly, and were often reduced to extreme distress for want of provisions. B. Diaz, p. 142. Cortes, Relat. 271, D. Cortes on one occasion mentions flightly the subsistence of his army; and after acknowledging that they were often in great want, adds, that they received supplies from the people of the country, of fish, and of some fruit, which he calls the cherries of the country. Ibid. B. Diaz fays, that they had cakes of maize, and ferafas de la tierra; and when the feafon of these was over, another fruit, which he calls Tunas; but their most comfortable subsistence was a root which the Indians use as food, to which he gives the name of Quilites, p. 142. The Indian auxiliaries had one means of subsissence more than the Spaniards. They fed upon the bodies of the Mexicans whom they killed in battle, Cor. Relat. 176, C. B. Diaz confirms his relation, and adds, that when the Indians returned from Mexico to their own country, they carried with them large quantities of the flesh of the Mexicans salted or dried as a most acceptable present to their friends, that they might have the pleasure of feeding upon the bodies of their enemies in their festivals, p. 157. De Solis, who feems to confider it as an imputation of difcredit to his countrymen, that they should act in concert with auxiliaries who fed upon human flesh, is solicitous to prove, that the Spaniards endeavoured to prevent their affociates from eating the bodies of the Mexicans, lib. v. c. 24. But he has no authority for this from the original historians. Neither Cortes himself, nor B. Diaz. feem to have had any fuch fcruple; and, on many occasions, mention the Indian repasts, which were become familiar to them, without any mark of abhorrence. Even with this additional flock of food for the Indians, it was hardly possible to procure subsistence for, armies amounting to fuch numbers as we find in the Spanish writers. Perhaps the best solution of the difficulty is, to adopt the opinion of B. Diaz del Castillo, the most artless of all the Historiadores primitivos, " When Gomara (says he) on some occasion relates, that there were so many thousand Indians our auxiliaries, and on others, that there were so many thousand houses in this or that town, no regard is to be paid to his enumeration, as he has no authority for it, the numbers not being in reality the fifth of what he relates. If we add together the different numbers which he mentions, that country would contain more millions than there are in Castile." C. 129. But though some considerable deduction should certainly be made from the Spanish accounts of the Mexican forces, they must have been very numerous; for nothing but an immense superiority in number could have enabled them to withstand a body of nine hundred Spaniards, conducted by a leader of fuch abilities as Cortes.

a most

NOTE CXXII. p. 263.

In relating the oppressive and cruel proceedings of the conquerors of New Spain, I have not followed B. de las Casas as my guide. His account of them, Relat. de la Destruyc. p. 18, &c. is manifestly exaggerated. It is from the testimony of Cortes himself and of Gomara, who wrote under his eye, that I have taken my account of the punishment of the Panucans, and they relate it without any difapprobation. B. Diaz, contrary to his usual custom, mentions it only in general terms, c. 162. Herrera, solicitous to extenuate this barbarous action of his countrymen, though he mentions 63 caziques, and Aco men of note, as being condemned to the flames, afferts that thirty only were burnt, and the rest par-doned. Dec. iii. lib. v. c. 7. But this is contrary to the testimony of the original historians, particularly of Gomara, whom it appears he had consulred, as he adopts feveral of his expressions in this passage. The punishment of Guatimozin is related by the most authentic of the Spanish writers. Torquemada has extracted from a history of Tezeuco, composed in the Mexican tongue, an account of this transaction, more favourable to Guatimozin than that of the Spanish authors. Mon. Indiana, i. 575. According to the Mexican account, Cortes had scarcely a shadow of evidence to justify such a wanton act of cruelty. B. Diaz affirms, that Guatimozin and his fellow-sufferers afferted their innocence with their last breath, and that many of the Spanish soldiers condemned this action of Cortes as equally unnecessary and unjust, p. 200, b. 201, a.

NOTE CXXIII. p. 266.

THE motive for undertaking this expedition was to punish Christoval de Olid, one of his officers, who had revolted against him, and aimed at establishing an independent jurisdiction. Cortes regarded this insurrection as of such dangerous example, and dreaded so much the abilities and popularity of its author, that in person he led the body of troops destined to suppress it. He marched, according to Gomara, three thousand miles, through a country abounding with thick forests, rugged mountains, deep rivers, thinly inhabited, and cultivated only only in a few places. What he suffered from famine, from the hostility of the natives, from the climate, and from hardships of every species, has nothing in history parallel to it, but what occurs in the adventures of the other discoverers and conquerors of the New World. Cortes was employed in this dreadful fervice above two years, and though it was not distinguished by any splendid event, he exhibited, during the course of it, greater personal courage, more fortitude of mind, more perfeverance and patience, than in any other period or scene in his life. Herrera, dec. iii. lib. vi. vii, viii, ix. Gomara, Cron. c. 163-167. B. Diaz, 174-190. Cortes, MS. penes me. Were one to write a life of Cortes, the account of this expedition should occupy a splendid place in it. In a general history of America. as the expedition was productive of no great event, the mention of it is fufficient.

NOTE CXXIV. p. 267.

ACCORDING to Herrera, the treasure which Cortes brought with him, confifted of fifteen hundred marks of wrought plate, two hundred thousand pelos of fine gold, and ten thousand of inferior standard, many rich jewels, one in particular, worth forty thousand pefos, and feveral trinkets and ornaments of value. Dec. iv. lib. iii. c. 8. lib. iv. c. 1. He afterwards engaged to give a portion with his daughter of a hundred thoufand pefos. Gomara, Cron. c. 237. The fortune which he left his fons was very confiderable. But, as we have before related, the fum divided among the conquerors on the first reduction of Mexico was very small. There appears then to be some reason for sufpecting that the accusations of Cortes's enemies were not altogether destitute of foundation. They charged him with having applied to his own use a disproportionate share of the Mexican spoils; with having concealed the royal treasures of Montezuma and Guatimozin; with defrauding the king of his fifth; and robbing his followers of what was due to them. Herrera, dec. iii. lib. viii. c. 15. dec. iv. lib. iii. c. 8. Some of the conquerors themselves entertained suspicions of the same kind, with respect to this part of his conduct. B. Diaz, c. 157.

NOTE CXXV. p. 271.

In tracing the progress of the Spanish arms in New Spain, we have followed Cortes himself as our most certain guide. His dispatches to the emperor contain a minute account of his operations. But the unlettered conqueror of Peru was incapable of relating his own exploits. Our information with respect to them, and other transactions in Peru, is derived however from contemporary and respectable authors.

The most early account of Pizarro's transactions in Peru, was published by Francisco de Xerez, his secretary. It is a simple unadorned narrative, carried down no farther than the death of Atahualpa, in 1533; for the author returned to Spain in 1534, and soon after he landed, printed at Seville his short History of the Conquest of Peru, addressed to the emperor.

Don Pedro Sancho, an officer who served under Pizarro, drew up an account of his expedition, which was translated into Italian by Ramusio, and inserted in his valuable collection, but has never been published in its original language. Sancho returned to Spain at the same time with Xerez. Great credit is due to what both these authors relate concerning the progress and operations of Pizarro; but the residence of the Spaniards in Peru had been so short, at the time when they lest it, and their intercourse with the natives so slender, that their knowledge of the Peruvian manners and customs is very impersect.

The next contemporary historian is Pedro Cieza de Leon, who published his Cronica del Peru, at Seville, in 2553. If he had finished all that he proposes in the general division of his work, it would have been the most complete history which had been published of any region in the New World. He was well qualified to execute it, having ferved during feventeen years in America, and having visited in person most of the provinces concerning which he had occasion to write. But only the first part of his Chronicle has been printed. It contains a description of Peru, and several of the adjacent provinces, with an account of the institutions and customs of the natives, and is written with fo little art, and fuch an apparent regard for truth, that one must regret the loss of the other parts of his work.

gion

This lofs is amply supplied by Don Augustine Zarate, who published, in 1555, his Historia del Descubrimiento y Conquesta de la Provincia del Peru. Zaratè was a man of rank and education, and employed in Peru as comptroller-general of the public revenue. His history, whether we attend to its matter or composition, is a book of confiderable merit: as he had an opportunity to be well informed, and feems to have been inquisitive with respect to the manners and transactions of the Peruvians, great credit is due to his testimony.

Don Diego Fernandez published his Historia del Peru in 1571. His fole object is to relate the diffensions and civil wars of the Spaniards in that empire. As he ferved in a public station in Peru, and was well acquainted both with the country, and with the principal actors in those singular scenes which he describes, as he possessed found understanding and great impartiality, his work may be ranked among those of the historians most distinguished for their industry in research, or their capacity in judging with respect to the events which they relate.

The last author who can be reckoned among the contemporary historians of the conquest of Peru, is Garcilasso de la Vega, Inca. For though the first part of his work, intitled, Commentarios Reales del Origen de los Incas Reies del Peru, was not published sooner than the year 1600, seventy fix years after the death of Atahualpa the last emperor, yet as he was born in Peru, and was the fon of an officer of distinction among the Spanish conquerors,

conquerors, by a Coya, or lady of the royal race, on account of which he always took the name of Inca; as he was mafter of the language spoken by the Incas, and acquainted with the traditions of his countrymen, his authority is rated very high, and often placed above that of all the other historians. His work, however, is little more than a commentary upon the Spanish writers of the Peruvian Rory, and composed of quotations taken from the authors whom I have mentioned. This is the idea which he himself gives of it Lib i. c. 10. Nor is it in the account of facts only that he follows them fervilely. Even in explaining the institutions and rites of his ancestors, his information seems not to be more perfect than theirs. His explanation of the Quipos is almost the same with that of Acosta. He produces no specimen of Peruvian poetry, but that wretched one which he borrows from Blas Valera, an early missionary, whose memoirs have never been published. Lib. ii. c. 1 c. As for composition, arrangement, or a capacity of diffinguishing between what is fabulous, what is probable, and what is true, one fearches for them in vain in the commentaries of the Inca. His work, however, notwithstanding its great defects, is not altogether destitute of use. Some traditions which he received from his countrymen are preserved in it. His knowledge of the Peruvian language has enabled him to correct fome errors of the Spanish writers, and he has inserted in it fome curious facts, taken from authors whose works were never published, and are now lost.

NOTE CXXVI. p. 276.

ONE may form an idea both of the hardships which they endured, and of the unhealthful climate in the regions which they visited, from the extraordinary mortality that prevailed among them. Pizarro carried out 112 men, Almagro 70. In less than nine months 120 of these died. Few sell by the sword; most of them were cut off by diseases. Xerez, p. 180.

NOTE CXXVII. p. 279.

This island, says Herrera, is rendered so uncomfortable by the unwholesomeness of its climate, its impenetrable woods, its rugged mountains, and the multitude of insects and reptiles, that it is seldom any softer epithet than that of insernal is employed in describing it. The sun is almost never seen there, and throughout the year it hardly ever ceases to rain. Dec. 3. lib. x. c. 3. Dampier touched at this island in the year 1685; and his account of the climate is not more favourable. Vol. i. p. 172. He, during his cruise on the coast, visited most of the places where Pizarro landed, and his description of them throws light on the narrations of the early Spanish historians.

NOTE CXXVIII. p. 295.

By this time horses had multiplied greatly in the Spanish settlements on the continent. When Cortes began his expedition in the year 1518, though his armament was more considerable than that of Pizarro, and composed of persons superior in rank to those who invaded Peru, he could procure no more than sixteen horses.

NOTE CXXIX. p. 296.

In the year 1740, D. Ant. Ulloa, and D. George Juan, travelled from Guayquil to Motupe, by the same route which Pizarro took. From the description of their journey, one may form an idea of the difficulty of his march. The sandy plains between St. Michael de Pieura and Motupe extend 90 miles, without water, without a tree, a plant, or any green thing, on a dreary stretch of burning sand. Voyage, tom. i. p. 399, &c.

NOTE CXXX. p. 302.

This extravagant and unfeafonable difcourse of Valverde has been cenfored by all historians, and with justice. But though he feems to have been an illiterate and higoted monk, nowife refembling the good Olmedo, who accompanied Cortes; the abfurdity of his address to Atahualpa must not be charged wholly upon His harangue is evidently a translation or paraprase of that form, concerted by a junto of Spanish divines and lawyers in the year 1509, for explaining the right of their king to the fovereignty of the New World. and for directing the officers employed in America how they should take possession of any new country. See Vol. i. Note xxiii. The fentiments contained in Valverde's harangue must not then be imputed to the bigoted imbecility of a particular man, but to that of the Bu' Gomara and Benzoni relate one circumstance concerning Valverde which, if authentic, renders him an object, not of contempt only, but of horror. They affert, that during the whole action, Valverde continued to excite the foldiers to flaughter, calling to them to strike the enemy, not with the edge, but with the points of their fwords. Gom. Cron. c. 112. Benz. Histor. Nov. Orbis, lib. iii. c. 3. Such behaviour was very different from that of the Roman Catholic clergy in other parts of America, where they uniformly exerted their influence to protect the Indians, and to moderate the ferocity of their countrymen.

NOTE CXXXI. p. 303.

Two different fystems have been formed concerning the conduct of Atahualpa. The Spanish writers, in order to justify the violence of their countrymen, contend, that all the Inca's professions of friendship were feigned; and that his intention in agreeing to an interview with Pizarro at Caxamalca, was to cut off him and his followers at one blow; that for this purpose he advanced

advanced with fuch a numerous body of attendants, who had arms concealed under their garments to execute this scheme. This is the account given by Xerez and Zarate. and adopted by Herrera. But if it had been the plan of the Inca to destroy the Spaniards, one can hardly imagine that he would have permitted them to march unmolested through the defert of Motupe, or have neglected to defend the passes in the mountains, where they might have been attacked with fo much advantage. If the Peruvians marched to Caxamalca with an intention to fall upon the Spaniards, it is inconceivable, that of fo great a body of men, prepared for action, not one should attempt to make resistance, but all tamely suffer themselves to be butchered by an enemy whom they were armed to attack. Atahualpa's mode of advancing to the interview, has the aspect of a peaceable procession, not of a military enterprize. He himself and his followers were, in their habits of ceremony, pre-ceded, as on days of folemnity, by unarmed harbingers. Though rude nations are frequently cunning and falle. yet, if a scheme of deception and treachery must be imputed either to a monarch, that had no great reason to be alarmed at a vifit from strangers who solicited admission into his presence as friends, or to an adventurer fo daring, and fo little scrupulous as Pizarro, one cannot hesitate in determining where to fix the presumption of guilt. Even amidst the endeavours of the Spanish writers to palliate the proceedings of Pizarro, one plainly perceives, that it was his intention, as well as his interest, to seize the Inca, and that he had taken measures for that purpose previous to any suspicion of that monarch's defigns.

Garcilasso de la Vega, extremely solicitous to vindicate his countrymen, the Peruvians, from the crime of having concerted the destruction of Pizarro and his followers, and no less asraid to charge the Spaniards with improper conduct towards the Inca, has framed another system. He relates, that a man of majestic form, with a long beard, and garments reaching to the ground.

ground, having appeared in a vision to Viracocha, the eighth Inca, and declared that he was a child of the Sun, that monarch built a temple in honour of his perfon, and erected an image of him, refembling as nearly as possible the singular form in which he had exhibited himself to his view. In this temple, divine honours were paid to him, by the name of Viracocha. P. i. lib. iv. c. 21. lib. v c, 22. When the Spaniards first appeared in Peru, the length of their beards, and the dress they wore, fruck every person so much with their likeness to the image of Viracocha, that they supposed them to be children of the Sun, who had descended from heaven to earth. All concluded, that the fatal period of the Peruvian empire was now approaching, and that the throne would be occupied by new possessors. Atahualpa himfelf, confidering the Spaniards as meffengers from heaven, was so far from entertaining any thoughts of refifting them, that he determined to yield implicit obedience to their commands. From those sentiments flowed his professions of love and respect. To those were owing the cordial reception of Soto and Ferdinand Pizarro in his camp, and the submissive reverence with which he himself advanced to visit the Spanish general in his quarters; but from the gross ignorance of Philipillo the interpreter, the declaration of the Spaniards, and his answer to it, were so ill explained, that by their mutual inability to comprehend each other's intentions, the fatal rencounter at Caxamalca, with all its dreadful confequences, was occasioned,

It is remarkable, that no traces of this superstitious veneration of the Peruvians for the Spaniards, are to be found either in Xerez, or Sancho, or Zarate, previous to the interview at Caxamalca; and yet the two former served under Pizarro at that time, and the latter visited Peru soon after the conquest. If either the Inca himself, or his messengers, had addressed the Spaniards in the words which Garcilasso puts in their mouths, they must have been struck with such submissive declarations; and they would certainly have availed themselves selves of them to accomplish their own designs with greater facility. Garcilaffo himfelf, though his narrative of the intercourse between the Inca and Spaniards, preceding the rencounter at Caxamalca, is founded on the Supposition of his believing them to be Viracochas, or divine beings, p. ii. lib. i. c. 17, &c. yet with his usual inattention and inaccuracy he admits, in another place. that the Peruvians did not recollect the resemblance between them and the god Viracocha, until the fatal disasters subsequent to the defeat at Caxamalca, and then only began to call them Viracochas. P. i. lib. v. c. 21. This is confirmed by Herrera, dec. 5. lib. ii. c. 12. In many different parts of America, if we may believe the Spanish writers, their countrymen were considered as divine beings who had descended from Heaven. But in this instance, as in many which occur in the intercourse between nations whose progress in refinement is very unequal, the ideas of those who used the expression were different from the ideas of those who heard it. For such is the idiom of the Indian languages, or such is the simplicity of those who speak them, that when they see any thing with which they were formerly unacquainted, and of which they do not know the origin; they fay, that it came down from Heaven. Nugnez. Ram. iii. 327, C.

The account which I have given of the fentiments and proceedings of the Peruvians, appears to be more natural and confistent than either of the two preceding, and is better supported by the facts related by the contemporary historians.

According to Xerez, p. 200, two thousand Peruvians were killed. Sancho makes the number of the slain fix or seven thousand. Ram. iii. 274, D. By Garcilasso's account, five thousand were massacred. P. ii. lib. i. c. 25. The number which I have mentioned, being the medium between the extremes, may probably be nearest the truth.

NOTE CXXXII. p. 304.

NOTHING can be a more striking proof of this, than that three Spaniards travelled from Caxamalca to Cuzco. The distance between them is fix hundred miles. every place throughout this great extent of country, they were treated with all the honours which the Peruvians paid to their fovereigns, and even to their divinities. Under pretext of amating what was wanting for the ranfom of the Inca, they demanded the plates of gold with which the walls of the Temple of the Sun in Cuzco were adorned; and though the priests were unwilling to alienate those facred ornaments, and the people refused to violate the shrine of their God, the three Spaniards, with their own hands, robbed the Temple of part of this valuable treasure; and such was the reverence of the natives for their persons, that though they beheld this act of facrilege with aftonishment, they did not attempt to prevent or disturb the commission of it. Zarate, lib. ii, c. 6. Sancho ap. Ramuf. ini. 375. D.

NOTE CXXXIII. p. 316.

According to Herrera, the spoil of Cuzco, after setting apart the king's fifth, was divided among 480 persons. Each received 4000 person. This amounts to 1,920,000 person. Dec. 5. lib. vi. c. 3. But as the general, and other officers, were entitled to a share far greater than that of the private men, the sum total must have risen much beyond what I have mentioned. Gomara, c. 123. and Zarate, lib. ii. c. 8. satisfy themselves with afferting in general, that the plunder of Cuzco was of greater value than the ransom of Atahualpa.

NOTE CXXXIV. p. 318.

No expedition in the New World was conducted with more perfevering courage than that of Alvarado, and in none were greater hardships endured. Many of the perfons engaged in it were, like their leader, veterans who had ferved under Cortes, inured to all the rigour of American war. Such of my readers as have not an opportunity of perufing the striking description of their fufferings by Zarate or Herrera, may form some idea of the nature of their march from the fea-coast to Quito, by confulting the account which D. Ant. Ulloa gives of his own journey in 1736, nearly in the same route. Voy. tom. i. p. 178, &c. or that of M. Bouguer, who proceeded from Puerto Viejo, to Quito, by the fame road which Alvarado took. He compares his own journey with that of the Spanish leader, and by the comparison, gives a most striking idea of the boldness and patience of Alvarado, in forcing his way through fo many obstacles. Voyage du Perou, p. 28, &c.

NOTE CXXXV. p. 319.

According to Herrera, there were entered on account of the king in gold, 155,300 pefos, and 5400 marks (each 8 ounces) of filver, besides several vessels and ornaments, some of gold, and others of filver; on account of private persons, in gold 499,000 pesos, and 54,000 marks of filver. Dec. 5. lib. vi. c. 13.

NOTE CXXXVI. p. 327.

THE Peruvians not only imitated the military arts of the Spaniards, but had recourse to devices of their own. As the cavalry were the chief object of their terror, they endeavoured to render them incapable of acting, by means of a long thong with a stone fastened to each end. This, when thrown by a skilful hand, twisted about the horse and its rider, and entangled them so as to obstruct their motions. Herrera mentions this as an invention of their own. Dec. 5. lib. viii. c. 4. But as I have observed, vol. ii. book iv. this weapon is common among several barbarous tribes towards the extremity of South America; and it is more probable, that the Peruvians had observed the dexterity with which they used it in hunting, and on this occasion adopted it themselves. The Spaniards were considerably annoyed by it, Herrera, ibid. Another instance of the ingenuity of the Peruvians deserves mention: By turning a river out of its channel, they overslowed a valley, in which a body of the enemy was posted, so suddenly, that it was with the utmost difficulty the Spaniards made their escape. Herrera, dec. 5. lib. viii. c. 5.

NOTE CXXXVII. p. 346.

HERRERA's account of Orellana's voyage is the most minute, and apparently the most accurate. It was probably taken from the journal of Orellana himfelf But the dates are not distinctly marked. His navigation down the Coca, or Napo, begun early in February 1541; and he arrived at the mouth of the river on the 26th of August, having spent near seven months in the voyage. M. de la Condamine, in the year 1743, failed from Cuenca, to Para, a settlement of the Portuguese at the mouth of the river, a navigation much longer than that of Orellana, in less than four months. Voyage, p. 179. But the two adventurers were very differently provided for the voyage. This hazardous undertaking, to which ambition prompted Orellana, and to which the love of science led M. de la Condamine, was undertaken in the year 1769, by Madame Godin des Odonais, from conjugal affection. The narrative of the hardships which she suffered, of the dangers to which she was exposed, and of the disasters which befel her, is one of the most fingular and affecting stories in any language, exhibiting in her conduct a striking picture of the fortitude which diftinguishes the one sex, mingled with the fenfibility and tenderness peculiar to the other. Lettre de M. Godin, à M. de la Condamine,

NOTE CXXXVIII. p. 349.

HERRERA gives a striking picture of their indigence. Twelve gentlemen who had been officers of distinction under Almagro, lodged in the same house, and having but one cloak among them, it was worn alternately by him who had occasion to appear in public, while the rest; from the want of a decent dress, were obliged to keep within doors. Their former friends and companions were fo much afraid of giving offence to Pizarro that they durst not entertain or even converse with them. One may conceive what was the condition, and what the indignation of men once accustomed to power and opulence, when they felt themselves poor and despised, without a roof under which to shelter their heads, while they beheld others, whose merit and services were not equal to theirs, living with splendour in sumptuous edifices. Dec. 6. lib. viii. c. 6.

NOTE CXXXIX. p. 361.

HERRERA, whose accuracy entitles him to great credit, afferts, that Gonzalo Pizarro possessed domains in the neighbourhood of Chuquesaca de la Plata, which yielded him an annual revenue greater than that of the archbishop of Toledo, the best endowed see in Europe. Dec. 7. lib, vi. c. 3.

NOTE CXL. p. 375.

All the Spanish writers describe his march, and the distresses of both parties, very minutely. Zarate observes, that hardly any parallel to it occurs in history, either with respect to the length of the retreat, or the ardour of the pursuit. Pizarro, according to his computation, followed the viceroy upwards of three thousand miles. Lib. v. c. 16. 26.

NOTE CXLI. p. 389.

IT amounted, according to Fernandez, the best informed historian of that period, to one million four hundred thousand pelos. Lib. ii. c. 79.

NOTE CXLII. p. 391.

CARVAJAL, from the beginning, had been an advocate for an accommodation with Gasca. Finding Pizarro incapable of holding that bold course which he originally suggested, he recommended to him a timely submission to his sovereign as the safest measure. When the president's offers were first communicated to Carvajal, "By our Lady, (said he, in that strain of bussionary which was samiliar to him,) the priest issue gracious bulls. He gives them both good and cheap; let us not only accept them, but wear them as reliques about our necks." Fernandez, lib. ii. c 63.

NOTE CXLIII. p. 396.

During the rebellion of Gonzalo Pizarro, seven hundred men were killed in battle, and three hundred and eighty were hanged or beheaded. Herrera, dec. 8. lib. iv. c. 4. Above three hundred of these were cut off by Carvajal. Fernandez, lib. ii. c. 91. Zarate makes the number of those put to a violent death five hundred. Lib. vii. c. 1.

THE END OF THE SECOND VOLUME.

